Mr. Grunderson expanded under the influence of bottled stont and Madeira, and was very loquacious; but sinking presently into a rather stertorous slumber, which he called forty winks, and which generally lasted about an hour and a half, the ci-devant market-gardener left Rosa and Roderick to their own resources. On this Mr. Lowther would have departed, but the candid Rosa begged him to remain. She had kept up a visiting acquaintance with most of her old school-fellows, and as she was perpetually making new acquaintances, she was positively besieged by callers, and had a tea-drinking institution, which she called a kettle-drum, almost every afternoon. The idea of exhibiting the elegant diplomatist to her feminine circle was eminently delightful to Miss Grunderson.

The male element was very much in the minority at Miss Grundersou's gatherings, and was chiefly represented by speechless younger brothers, who came in sulky submission to overbearing sisters, and who lounged in uncomfortable attitudes upon Rosa's most fragile chairs, spilt their tea upon the velvet table-covers, rarely moved without knocking something down, and left dingy thumb-marks in all Rosa's albums. Amongst such as these Roderick shone like a star of the first magnitude, and Miss Grunderson exhibited him with unspeakable pride. The kettle-drum lasted for two mortal hours, and Mr. Lowther was one of the last to depart, bored to death, as he told his brother afterwards.

"But a fellow must bring his mind to go through a good deal if he wants to marry a millionaire's only daughter in these hard times," thought the attache, despondently, as he went yawning to bed. "If my lovely Rosa does become Mrs. Lowther, she will have to renounce her penchant for bad French and violent pink dresses; but she may cram her drawing-room with acquaintance of quasi-gentility, and drink tea all day, so far as I shall be concerned."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

TOO LATE.

A long miserable week wore itself slowly out, after the night in which Francis Tredethlyn had turned his back upon a house, which he had never been allowed to find a home. Through all the week there had been no tidings of Maude's departed husband: but when the week was over a formal letter from Mr. Kursdale acquainted her with Mr. Tredethlyn's arrangements for her welfare, and with the fact that he had embarked the day before on board the steam-vessel Kingfisher bound for Buenos Ayres. The news inflicted as great a shock upon Maude as if her husband's letter announcing his intended departure had never been written. To the last she had believed that when the time for action came his resolution would fail him all at once, and he would hurry back to her, faithful and devoted as in the earliest days of their brief married life, when he had nursed her Skye terriers, and sat patiently for an hour at a stretch in a haberdasher's shop while she selected ribbons and laces. She had written him a penitent letter, and had enclosed it to Mr. Kursdale, entreating that gentleman to deliver it to his client whenever he saw him. She had not thought it possible that, even if Francis persisted in his intention of leaving England, he would leave without an interview with his solicitor. But when Maude drove post-haste to Gray's Inn, and presented herself in the lawyer's office, she found that there had been no interview. Francis had communicated with his solicitor by letter only, and his clear and concise epistle bore the date of the very day on which he was to start for Plymouth, whence the Kingfisher was bound for.

The letter thus dated had arrived at the lawyers' office after business hours; and when Mr. Kursdale opened it next morning there was little doubt that the Kingfisher was outward bound with Francis Tredethlyn on board her. Maude made a confidant of her husband's solicitors. A family lawyer is a kind of father confessor in the matter of secrets, and has generally outlived the capacity of surprise as completely as those imperturbable disciples of St. Ignatius Loyola who are irreverently entitled "crows." The despondent wife told Mr. Kursdale that Francis had left home in consequence of a slight misunderstanding—was any conjugal quarrel ever yet described by the belligerents as anything more than a slight misunderstanding?—and she implored him to assist her in bringing about her husband's speedy return.

"But do you think he has really sailed?" she asked; "do you think he could be so cruel as to leave England without even giving me the opportunity of imploring him to remain?"

Mr. Kursdale shook his head gravely.

"There is nothing in his letter to me which indicates indifference to your wishes," he said; "it is only a business letter; but in the practical way it is the strongest evidence of a husband's devotion that ever came to my knowledge. We lawyers are a matter-of-fact set of men, and we are apt to form our conclusions in a matter-of-fact way. What other people would treat as an affair of sentiment, we look at as an affair of figures; and I must say, Mrs. Tredethlyn, that gauged by that standard, your husband comes out nobly."

"But I want him to come back to me," Maude exclaimed, simply; "I don't want to be rich—or to live like a woman of fashion. He wrongs me most cruelly when he thinks that I married him for his money. I married him because he was good to my father. Do you think I could accept any part of the income which that letter places at my disposal, knowing that my husband has left his native country because of me? Tell me what I am to do, Mr. Kursdale. I know that Mr. Tredethlyn is unhappy, and that a few words from me would set all right. What am I do?"

"We must try to send him the few words, my dear Mrs. Tredethlyn," answered the lawyer, cheerfully. Shall I send the letter you enclosed to me the other day? Perhaps you would like to add something to it—another postscript to it, eh? Ladies have such a penchant for postscripts," said the lawyer, lapsing into mild facetiousness, which he imagined to be of an eminently consolatory character. There are people who believe that a feeble joke is an infallible specific for a deeply-rooted grief.

"I will send a clerk off to Plymouth by the next train," said Mr. Kursdale, with his hand upon the spring of a little bell beside him. He spoke as coolly as if had been talking of sending a clerk over the way. "If by any chance the Kingfisher has not sailed when the young man arrives, your husband will have the letter before dark. If the Kingfisher has sailed, the letter must be sent on by the next mail. At the worst, Mr. Tredethlyn may be back in six or seven weeks."

Maude's disappointment was very bitter the next day, when she received a note from the solicitor, informing her that the Kingfisher had sailed twelve hours before the clerk arrived at Plymouth.

After this, Maude could only await the result of her letter. Six or seven weeks seemed such a weary time, as she looked forward to it; and it might be as long as that, or even longer, before any tidings from Francis could reach her. She went to her father, to pour her sorrows into his ear; but though he received her very affectionately, she could see that he blamed her severely for the folly which had driven Francis Tredethlyn from his home.

Surely she must have loved him very dearly, or she scarcely could have regretted him so much. If she had been questioned as to the real state of her feelings on this point, she could not have given any clear reply to the question. She only knew that her husband had been very good to her, and that she had repaid his devotion with neglect and indifference. All her life for the last year had been crowded with proofs of Francis Tredethlyn's unbounded love; and, looking back upon them, she could not remember one instance in which she had been sufficiently grateful for his affection.

"Those silly young men at the Cedars used to make a fool of me with their empty flatteries," she thought remorsefully; "and I treated Frank as I had learned to treat them."

There was one thing that Maude did not remember as she looked back at her past life, and that was Harcourt Lowther's influence. She did not know how much of her indifference to her husband had been engendered by the subtle sarcasms of her jilted lover; nor did she know how the schemer had practiced upon her girlish love of society in order to widen the gulf that divided her from Francis Tredethlyn. Her errors as a wife had chiefly arisen from want of leisure. She had found no time to adapt herself to her husband's tastes—no time to give him any return for those practical proofs of his affection in the way of jewels and carriages, thoroughbred steppers and hundred-guinea shawls, which he was constantly lavishing upon her; and worse than all, she found no time to inquire how he passed his life, or in what circles he sought the happiness she had never tried to provide for him in his home.

While she was thinking very penitently upon the past, and weaving pleasant schemes for the future; while she was perpetually counting the days which must elapse before Francis returned to her, always supposing that the remorseful words of her letter found their way straight to his heart, as she implicitly believed they would; while she was praying daily and nightly for his safe preservation in tempest and danger, Maude Tredethlyn took up the Times newspaper one morning, as she loitered listlessly over a lonely breakfast table, and the first paragraph that met her eyes was the announcement of the Kingfisher's total destruction by fire, and the entire loss of passengers and crew.

CHAPTER XL.

Harcourt Lowther had his copy of the great journal on the day when Maude read that horrible paragraph. Roderick had called at Stuccoville during Mrs. Tredethlyn's seclusion, and had heard of the Cornishman's departure, and the name of the vessel he had gone in, from Julia Desmond. The schemer turned deadly pale when his brother read him the brief account of the terrible catastrophe.

After the first shock that came upon him with these sudden tidings, Harcourt gave a long sigh of relief. "It was the fellow's own doing," he muttered. "If he had not made a quarrel with me, this never would have happened. And he's gone! Poor lad! He was not such a bad fellow, after all. Better to die that way than of delirium tremens," added Mr. Lowther, with a furtive glance towards a tall smoke-colored bottle which was apt to adorn his table very often now-a-days. "And so Maude is free—at last! Do you know, Roderick, it seems to me as if I had lived twenty years or so since my return from Van Dieman's Land? and now that the luck turns, and the winning color comes up for the first time, I feel as if I had outlived the power to care much about it. Roderick!" cried the invalid, with a sharp suddenness that startled his brother, "did Folson tell you there was any serious damage done to my head by that ugly fall the other night? I know he has talked to you about me. I heard you and he muttering together yesterday, when I was lying half asleep in the next room."

"Folson said very little about the damage you got in the row," the attache answered very coolly; "but he told me you must drop your liberal consumption of that sort of things or you'd find yourself very speedily in Queer street." Roderick pointed to the smoke-colored bottle. "While you were teaching that fellow Tredethlyn to drink himself to death, you ought to have learnt how to keep yourself alive by not drinking," he said presently; "however, I don't want to say anything unpleasant, but you really must cut your very intimate acquaintance with the brandy-bottle, if you want to improve your opportunity, now that Mrs. Tredethlyn is a rich widow. If you don't look sharp I shall throw over the Grunderson, and go in against you."

Harcourt smiled superciliously.

"I am not afraid of you, for more reasons than one," he said. "Maude is a curious girl. I sometimes fancy my own chance is not quite so good as it once was. Goethe says that a man wins in his age the prize he sighs for in his youth. Perhaps, when I am a pottering old fellow of seventy, I shall have a great fortune and a handsome wife. My soul is weary, Roderick; and now the chance has come, I'm not the man I was. Perhaps, after all, the simple truth of the matter is that I am suffering from an attack of blue-devils. I'll get you to send me round a hack, and I'll take a spin in the Park; the fresh air will blow my old self back again, I dare say. I'll meet you at the Metropolitan afterwards, if you like," added Harcourt, naming an adjacent restaurant at which the brothers had been wont to dine occasionally.

"No, thanks. I dine at the Grundersons'."

"Dejá! We go fast, my friend!"

"If your military experience had extended farther than the superintendence of penitent burglars, you might have known that where the assailing party is weak, a fortress must be taken quickly, or not at all. I declared myself to Rosa this morning. She is delighted with the idea of flourishing at foreign courts in ecrasante pink dresses. How I shall tone her down, poor child! I am to speak to papa Grunderson this evening, over his wine. He consumes the best part of a bottle of old port every night. Rosa tells me that he is an indulgent old party, and that I shall have no difficulty in bringing him to book."

"Then you really think of marrying?" asked Harcourt, thoughtfully

"Really think of marrying! Of course I do."

"I thought perhaps you might have some lingering regard for—that other person."

"I thought I told you that I didn't care to discuss that subject," he said haughtily. "Drop it, if you please. There are plenty of disagreeable things in your life, I daresay. I'll look in at the stables and send you the hack. A bientot!"

TOUSSENEL ON THE DOG.—For the dog M. Toussenel has an affection bordering upon animal worship. To the dog he thinks man owes the first rudiments of civilization. And by this token: without the dog man could have never kept sheep, which was clearly the first step in civilization. Upon this topic he says quaintly enough, "I know no more crushing condemnation of our actual phase than the tiny minority of animals we have been able to civilize. The impotence of the civilized man to rally round him all the beasts of the field, is, in fact, the most geometrical demonstration of the subversive character of civilization!" And he adds as his reason, "because the immense majority of the animal species have been created to love man and serve him, and the secret ambition of almost all is to ally themselves to their legitimate sovereign, although hitherto the dog is perhaps the only one who has had the courage to act upon his own opinion.

But this is not all. "The East is the cradle of all civilization because the East is the cradle of the dog. Take away the dog from the East, and what have you left? another America; the Roman, the Greek, the Egyptian, the Chinese, are nothing better than the Aztecs and Peruvians! The dog alone constitutes the whole superiority of the East over the West. For what, indeed, it may be asked, is the result of the whole intellectual effort of the Mohican? To track game. Now a young bandy-legged terrier knows as much about it in six months as the most intelligent savage at the end of a lifetime. The natives of the East, who had the dog, were thus dispensed from the physical drudgery which absorbed the time and energies of the redskins. They had surplus time left to create new industrial pursuits. Hence the origin of the arts and handicrafts. Hence the difference between the old and new worlds."

If this is not ingenious, what is? Nay, M. Toussenel ascribes cannibalism to the want of the dog. Man ate man for want of a dog to get him game. "Anthrophagy is endemic," says the author, "in countries disinherited of the dog."

SCANDAL LOVING.

THE moralist has issued many an invective against the trick of slurring one's neighbor. The best comedy our language, according to Byron, boasts, is a repertory of wit and eloquence aimed at this great social vice. I hardly think that too much has been said, and half believe that slander is a mental Hydra that never can be killed, so much does it usurp the intercourse of to-day, whether in the club-room or parlor. It makes one feel indignant at the whole collective force of humanity when conversation takes a personal turn anywhere in our city, and degenerates into a discussion of certain species of failing, real or suppositious. It seems as though every one was tainted with a sort of blind stinging malice, which might bring that apostle of selfishness, Hobbes, into fashion again with every social philosopher.

My indignation has been aroused—as is Emperor Norton's sometimes—to this pitch by reason of the careless manner in which certain villianous expressions are flung about in society. Young men and old apply them with a scandalous hardihood to every lady they meet, careless whether they are truthful in their application or not. Indeed, it seems to be the fashion to regard every woman they encounter on Montgomery street as a fit subject for slurs and insinuations. The least eccentricity of dress, tending towards gaiety, a peculiar saunter, an expression of the eyes, anything at all out of the way in person or garb, becomes a nucleus for calumny.

My pretty child, whose ringlets are admirable, whose eyes are clear and innocent, whose walk hath hardly yet changed from the hoydenish skip of childhood into the graceful step of the self-possessed woman, that dainty ribbon with which thou hast coquettishly bound together thy tresses, becomes thee and thy peach-blossom cheeks amazingly. Thy boyish hat looks charmingly placed just where it is; and thou art certainly a proper object for admiration by every man with the least speck of a heart within his ribs. If reverential care can at all be meted out by the cold world to anything that is thrown into it, thou shouldst certainly be regarded like some alabaster statue of Innocence, upon which no rude hand should be placed and no suspicious inspiration be breathed. Thou trippest along the street, looking frankly and smilingly into every face, as if expectant of some expression therein indicative of the same feeling towards thee on the part of humanity that thou art ready to evince towards it whenever called upon. But thy smile and step, thy gay ribbon and jaunty hat are only opportunities of slander on the part of that knowing looking youth who stands with his hands in his pockets, leaning nonchalantly against yonder doorpost. If thou hadst but heard his withering sickening remark to his companion, thy ribbon and hat would have been cast aside in tears, and thy smile would have long been an unready attendant upon thy beauty.

There is on that prominent corner, a knot of young men conversing. To you, young lady, who have doubtless met them in society, and have been the object of their most respectful attentions, they appear to be chivalrous knights, obedient to the slightest wishes of womanhood, manly in character, and scorners of falsehood and cowardly malice. So do they to me for the most part, and I would trust their word as much as their oath. But what they are saying to each other at this moment belies their character as well as yours. They are hunting up wrong inferences feasible from your conduct towards Tom Boggles at the ball the other night. They are noting the strange fact, also, that Tom was seen leaving your mother's residence at so late an hour last evening, and are getting up, like iconoclasts of character as they are, a shrewd case of circumstantial evidence that would forever forbid the bans of any marriage you might contract with a modern Cæsar. Can you blame me, if, for the moment, a strange hallucination takes hold of me, and I somehow fancy that I am watching a colony of cobras standing erect upon their tails, hidden beneath fashionable clothes, and retaining only the hissing vocal powers of their anguineal state? Perhaps they like you. They may not believe a tithe of what they are asserting so coldly; but the words they use, the sneer they essay, and the confidence their frank manners inspire, lead one into a dangerous credulity.

There is a handsome married lady sweeping Juno-like down the street. She is proud of her beauty, which she thinks should be admired just as one admires the fine mansion in which her husband has placed her, without ever losing sight of the fact that she and it are exclusively her husband's. Please now, my lounging friend, do not spoil the stately idea I have of her by hint and innuendo as to her prudence and common sense. You could not prove what your derisive smile is forerunning in any court ever held. I would not hang a dog on the evidence you can offer; but do not put the ugly notion into my mind, where it will lumber up space that might be better occupied, and where I may some day stumble over it to the great damage of my mental shins.

Young men, I who have become a little worn with the moral quarrels of the world, who can look back to reminiscences where slander has, with its asinine jaw, slain its thousands of happy days, where a foul utterance has spoiled more of purity than social justice has ever been able to restore, let me beg of you to fling the malicious habit aside. Stick to your pipe, if it is at all hard to give up; discard all noble resolutions about chewing, and look persistently on the wine when it is red, if you find its pleasures imperious; but give up your attacks on social reputation. Your mouths may be ever so unclean; they will be charming if they never spirt malice; and a sot travelling through the Valley of the Shadow of Death under the tender guidance of Delirium Tremens is a purer hero, if he has never shot a bolt at female character than any of our modern Joseph Surfaces going canting into their sepulchres.

DIONYSIUS VAGO.

(For the Californian.)

LET EVERY SHOEMAKER STICK TO HIS LAST.

"ALL men are born free and equal" in the sight of God, and it should be so in the State. Beyond that, this phrase has no meaning. For no one, no matter how catholic he may be in his religion, or democratic in his politics, or reformatory in his social views, would contend for a more liberal interpretation of this—to us Americans—truism. We take the position that one man is in every way—intellectually, morally, physically, politically, æsthetically, socially and pecuniarily—as good as every other man, if he is good. But we doubt very much whether the political freedom giving us the right to vote in this country as we each may please, or worship under whatever roof we choose, gives us all such an increased mental breadth of view, or new, additional accomplishments, or clearer perceptive powers, or sounder judgments, or sweeter tongues than the older civilizations of Europe have bestowed upon their representatives or supporters. But whether or not our characters have become more consolidated, or our decrees more equitable, or our criticism more correct, we have assumed as much, and indulge our prejudices, our impulses and our fancies, without limit in speech, as free of utterance as it is ornate in style. It is the spirit of liberty which is the genius of our institutions, taking upon itself the garb of license in the assumptions of a people. It is fostered by an untrammelled press, by the speech of demagognes, by our commercial pursuits, which, though necessary, deprive us of those hours for study and reflection which must be given if men would become scholars or prophets, and by the general misunderstanding of the Declaration of Independence, which is not a social but a political creed. We are yet young in the family of nations, but vigorous and true to the idea of our government; but with all our energy, and progress, and success, it will be a strange anomaly in human development if we ever reach that point where we can at first sight praise or blame with sound judgment whatever there is new or strange in science, art or fashion. Is it too much to say that such seems to be the point which we have already reached in the opinion of many?

All criticism upon the private rights of others, or fashion of dress, or marriage, or way of life, if it does not interfere with ourselves, is degeneracy; and the judgment of men upon subjects with which they are not familiar is worse than idleness, for it adds to the sin of idleness the vice of a more positive evil. We trust the days of prophecy are about over, and that we are beginning to learn to wait until the result approaches before we pass a judgment. Let prophesy hereafter wait upon induction, and the logical sequences of life lead to a more upright development of man. Let not the judgment founded upon caprice run counter to and be mocked by the judgment thereafter founded upon knowledge.

I want an astronomer to tell me of comets, not an astrologer; a banker, full-grown, successful, gray in historic memories of great monetary crises, to tell me of finance, not a shopkeeper; I will read my politics from the laws of my country, and history, and the writings of statesmen, not from the diluted potions of the daily press; my knowledge of strategy I will get from the successful movements of armies, not from the editor of the ———. Let us have no more of this shallow pretension—throw off this cloak of assurance and quackery which makes every nurse a physician, every voter a politician, and every lawyer a Major General. Let us try modesty awhile, and even if we discover to ourselves that we are very ignorant and superficial, the world will be infinitely better off, and we shall thereby take the first step toward wisdom. I have heard the questions of the war, the next election and the condition of our national finances settled readily and satisfactorily before the fire in the bar-room of a country tavern by the sagacious wiseacres who are sometimes wont there to congregate. What happiness that Bunsby is still left to us in the persons of his representatives!

Gab, in its full length and breadth, has done a vast deal of irreparable injury to human nature, and if we are to lose any gift given to us by God, we will regret the least of all that of speech. The confusion at Babel was a good thing in more ways than one. It put a stop to the building of that tower, and interposed between man and man a mountain which otherwise would have left the nations so free and accessible, that our now comparatively golden silence would have been lost, and in its place we should have set up the silvered idol of our streets.

Mrs. Snifkins asks "Sniffy" what he thinks about the management of the war. Now "Sniffy" is a tailor in Broadway, and also the wedded husband of Mrs. Snifkins. He reads the Herald, (all the tailors read the Herald,) therefore he is competent, from Mrs. Snifkin's stand-point, to say what he thinks about the war; and with weight, and in the most complacent and self-satisfied air in the brief time allowed him, "Sniffy" ventilates an opinion which thenceforward until the Herald changes its base, is the opinion of the parental "Sniffys" and master "Sniffy," æt. 17.

Hans Vantsall, at the old sign of the "three golden balls," between the puffs of his unredeemed meerschaum, entertains his charmed family circle by his felicitous praises of the beauties of charity. The dear man has heard how much better it is to give than to receive, and the motherly presence of Madame Vantsall only adds fervor to the inspiration of his generous heart. Why should not Hans talk of Charity, and say what he thinks about it? Doesn't he think he knows all there is known about it? Yes. Snifkins on the War; Vantsall on Charity; Bunsby on Navigation; and Toots on Family Living. Happy men—types, respectively, of our great human nature. The sway of your sceptres overshadows us all. Who can deny your presence amid the greatness, the wisdom and the immensity of ourselves. To have lived in your age were happiness enough to us all, ignorant of the darkness which will settle upon and conceal the future at your demise. May your existence be spared by the inexorable Lachesis, until the approach of a more temperate spirit begins to mark our characters, when the joy and reasonableness which will attest the coming of brighter days, may not be tinged by the saddened remembrance of the past.

My friend, living in the retirement which a happy disposition renders all that his contentment can ask, surrounded by his books, pictures and friends, finds time in the interim of his desultory studies, to reflect somewhat upon this quality of human nature, and gives these as his views, drawn out by the remark of his daughter: "I don't know for what reason she wanted to marry him!" It was a marriage, not of convenience, nor wealth, nor for a home, of which she was speaking, but a very natural marriage, where age, station and mental attainments met the supposed requirements of the social law. "I have come to the conclusion, my child, after some observation and reflection, and you see that my temples already begin to betray the silvery armor of a ripening age, that one can foretell the future of his friend almost unerringly up to this point, where the emotional of man too often controls the act which otherwise reason would direct, and in this our views will most probably be directly opposed. I suppose it arises from that strange awakening of love within us, 'by some touch of the hand, turn of head,' which, perhaps, we had not dreamed of before, and which cannot be explained, nor could it ever have been revealed in the many confidential disclosures of intimate friends. I should never attempt, for fear of failure, to solve the problem, or rather it seems a problem to me, of the marriage of our neighbor next door, with his family of six girls, and an ample fortune, to Mrs. Wiley, our neighbor in the next street, with five girls and also an ample fortune. I take it you would not make the attempt, either. You may have heard motives imputed by some parties, but that is no solution. The imputation of motives is very cheap, and therefore common, so any one may indulge in it. It is foolish and vulgar, not to say unchristian, and criminal. We are creatures of moods and relations. All the best men and women in town do not belong to our circle. That were physically impossible, even if our sympathies were attuned to the same key, as they are not. That is what divides society into cliques, and every person can get admitted into his proper clique if he will only bide his time. Cliques are good things. They confine our social duties within agreeable and comprehensible limits, protect the social divisions from each other, and from the promiscuous entrance of these persons who belong to no particular circle, but who feel as though they were fitted for all. But your question arises from no such general view of the social relations, nor can it be answered by it, if it can be answered at all. And is it not better, on the whole, that it cannot be answered. It is a subject, as it relates to my friend, upon which I would not waste a minute's thought. You will thus save yourself some disappointment, and be relieved from the fancied desire to know the reason of something which most likely you never can know. For it is the most private and sacred relation known to the law or life, and will endure no encroachments. Take it for granted that it is every way proper, if it is proper, and the parties are themselves agreed; that you are mistaken on one point at least; so run and congratulate your friend without more ado. You will thus save your mortification, your friend, your philosophy and your good sense, which will ever afterwards approve your conduct and be your best characteristic."

It is related that Apelles, the Grecian painter, desirous of perfecting a picture upon which he had long been engaged, placed it upon the sidewalk in the most public street of Athens for the observation and criticism of the passers-by, and, that he might reap the advantage he sought, placed himself behind it. Each looker-on made his criticism, and the artist took his notes. A cobbler, naturally looked at the feet, noticed the faults in the drawing of the shoes, and remarked upon them. The following day the picture was replaced with the shoes retouched by the artist, and the cobbler noticing the success of his former criticism looked about for other faults, and began to make unfavorable comments on other parts of the picture. At this point, Apellas, not wishing any further voluntary judgments from this "gentleman," shows himself, and in the most chaste Attic dialect at his command, requests "That every shoemaker should stick to his last." Horace has it "Ne sutor ultra crepidam."

EXOTIC PLANTS.

THE cultivation of exotic plants, whether with a view of producing fruits or flowers, is admitted to hold the highest rank in horticultural science, and it would appear that a taste for the enjoyment this pursuit yields must have existed from a very early period, and that it has kept pace with the more refined and peaceful arts wherever these have flourished. The writings of Virgil, Horace, Seneca and Martial sufficiently prove that among the nations of antiquity a very strong attachment existed for cultivating exotic flowers; and the two latter historians speak of the practice both of retarding and producing them prematurely by artificial means, during the more luxurious days of the empire. About the commencement of the fifteenth century, the wealthy merchants of Venice and Genoa began to introduce the plants of the East into Europe, and botanical collections were commenced by the inhabitants of these enterprising and opulent cities. The wealthy Flemings also, according to Lobel, imported plants from the Levant and the East Indies as early as the times of the Crusaders, and their gardens are said to have contained more exotic plants than all the rest of Europe besides, until the desolating civil wars of the sixteenth century diverted men's minds from such peaceful pursuits. About the middle of the sixteenth century, a taste for exotic flowering plants began to prevail in Britain; for about this period the Duke of Somerset at Sion House, Edward St. Loo in Somersetshire, Gerrard, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others, were all importers of new and rare plants.

This taste has been continued and fostered by all enlightened communities, and the greater facilities for travelling and collecting the rare and curious plants from all parts of the known world have developed a large variety of plants, which have some remarkable characteristics. The ornamental foliaged plants are now attracting a great deal of attention from the most successful cultivators, and are to be found among the ferns, grasses, flowering shrubs and trees and the herbaceous plants, and in many instances the leaves are so strikingly conspicuous that the flowers among them only rank second in beauty. All leaves are beautiful to thoughtful and observant natures; the examination of each leaf and flower will reveal beauties to them which would pass unnoticed by the ordinary observer. All things in nature are beautiful, and it is only those who overlook or cannot appreciate the loveliness of God's creation that have their beauties hidden from them.

"Most beautiful the world is yet, and beautiful 'twill prove,
Whilst one single God-made creature remains its charms to love;
'Tis man's own silly blindness makes the world deformed alone,
Who know it most, see beauty most; who know it least, see none."

Within the last few years, so many of these gems have been introduced into cultivation in Europe and the East that we are quite surprised that some of our plant-lovers here have not an entire collection in their conservatories or plant-cabinets, for with such a collection they would always look beautiful. We will give a list of some of the most strikingly beautiful foliaged plants with their habits and mode of culture:

Maranta Zebrina, or Calathea Zebrina, is a native of Brazil, and was first introduced into cultivation in England, where it was greatly admired for the rich velvety appearance of its leaves. The leaves are about two feet long and six inches wide, of dark, deep green, striped with purple, having a richness of shade like the finest velvet. The flowers, which spring from the root in a spike like form, are of a rich purple color, shaded with red and white.

Dracæna Ferrea Versicolor is a native of the East Indies. With its long lance-shaped leaves of a deep green, terminated by brilliant crimson and scarlet markings, it forms one of the most conspicuous plants for a collection, and it is this variety of form and color that will make them interesting.

Croton Variegata is also a native of the East Indies. The leaves are about six or eight inches long and from one to two wide. They are very handsome, being densely variegated, striped and mottled with yellow on a green ground. There is no variegated plant, when grown, that will surpass this in beauty. The flowers are white and green.

Croton Pictum is another of the same variety, with a different color of foliage, being curiously spotted and marked with crimson and red, instead of yellow. These form beautiful plants for vases or ornamental stands at the entrance to a conservatory.

Dieffenbachia Seguina is a native of South America. It is a shrubby plant, growing to the height of three to five feet, bearing leaves about a foot in length and from four to six inches wide, of an oval pointed shape. The color of the leaf is a very light green, dotted over with numberless irregularly shaped white figures, giving the plant a very striking appearance. It is a quick grower and should be in every collection

Begonia Rex is also a native of South America, and is one of the most beautiful variegated plants cultivated. The leaves are large, of an oblique oval shape; the ground color of the leaf is a dark green, having a broad band of pure silver white about midway between the margin and the centre, and is studded all over the upper and lower sides with short crimson hairs, giving it a most peculiar appearance, There is a very great variety of them and they are all worthy of cultivation.

Caladium Bicolor Splendens is a native of Madeira, is a bulbus plant, and has a most ornamental foliage, resembing in shape the common calla, but of a much a larger size. The centre of each leaf has a bright metallic lustre, between scarlet and crimson, while the outer edge of the leaf is a dark green. No description can convey any adequate idea of the beauty of this leaf or of the plant in perfection.

Anœctochilus Xanthophyllus is a native of Ceylon, and the natives call it the "King of the Woods," not from the flowers, which are insignificant, but from the foliage of it, which is the most beautiful among plants. It has rich velvety leaves having a metallic lustre, and being curiously inlaid with streaks of golden and frosted network, and by being moved in different lights, produces the same changeable appearance that some of the beautiful pearl shells do. The plant is small, and is generally grown under a glass shade to preserve it from dust and harm, and there is no gem equal to it in beauty.

Cissus Discolor is a climber, and a native of Java. The leaves are from six to eight inches long and from two to four broad, pointed; they are colored on the upper surface in the richest manner conceivable, the color being a rich green, clouded with peach, white and dark-purplish crimson, and all having a deep metallic lustre. The under side of the leaf is of a rich brownish crimson.

If some of our citizens of wealth and taste were to see these exquisitely beautiful productions of nature, they certainly would take the advice of Cowper, when he says:

"Who loves a garden, loves a greenhouse too;
Unconscious of a less propitious clime
There blooms exotic beauty, warm and snug;
While the winds whistle and the snows descend,
The spiry myrtle, with unwithering leaf,
Shines there and flourishes. The golden boast
Of Portugal and Western India there,
The ruddier orange, and the paler lime
Peep through their polish'd foliage at the storm
And seem to smile at what they need not fear."

THE DEER CREEK WAR.—The war on Deek creek, which resulted, on the 18th, in the killing of one Chinaman and seriously wounding another, appears to have originated in a question of water-right. Adam Shirley and others sold a dam and ditch to a Chinese company, promising to repair it, and went there to do so on the day above mentioned. They had no sooner commenced than a second company of Celestials, whose free water would be shut off if the Shirley party completed their work, surrounded the white men. The Chinese were armed with picks and shovels, greatly outnumbering the whites. The whites were in close quarters, and their enemies advancing, when Shirley told them if they came any father he would shoot. They still advanced, and Shirley fired the first shot, hitting a Chinaman in the breast, killing him almost instantly. A second shot was fired, wounding another Chinaman in the hand and hip. The Chinamen then retired, and the Shirley party left. Captain Robbins, who was around collecting taxes, was captured by the Chinamen soon after, and compelled to walk to Grass Valley, leaving his horse tied near the scene of the conflict. The Captain had as little to do with the affray as a child unborn, but the Chinamen thought he had, which was all the same. The authorities soon released the Captain, knowing he had nothing to do with the tragedy which had been enacted.—Nevada Transcript.

ANOTHER RICH LEAD.—We learn, says the Nevada Transcript, that an exceedingly rich discovery was made in the Meadow Lake District a day or two since, between the North and South Forks of the South Yuba. An enthusiastic prospector who struck the ledge, stood guard over it all night, for fear some one would jump his claim. The rock is of grayish color, and is filled with gold. The miners are enthusiastic in regard to the district, and several who are now in town propose returning in a short time.

OPPOSITION REVIVED.—The opposition steamer America sailed on Thursday with passengers for New York, via San Juan del Sur. The Ericcson is to be the connecting steamer on the Atlantic side. She was built for Captain Ericcson—inventor of the Monitors—in a staunch and most thorough manner, and was originally provided with hot air or "caloric engines," as a motive power; but these proving insufficient in power, adequate steam power and machinery was placed in her, and she now ranks as a well-fitted steamship in every respect.

A CALIFORNIA interior paper says that their orator on the Fourth had a platform ten feet square; nevertheless, his fist collided three times with the President, in addition to damaging the eye or the reader of the Declaration of Independence. Every person on the stage left it limping.

A MODERN GHOST.

ON the 20th day of November, 1856, four gentlemen were passengers in a first-class carriage by the train leaving Euston Square for L—— at five o'clock. Under ordinary circumstances each would have coiled himself in his wrapper and read, or dozed, in his respective corner. But it happened that among the travellers was Mr. Smith Jones, one of the most eminent, if not the most eminent of the Q. C.'s of the day. Skilful jurist as he was, he owed a great part of his reputation and success to his wonderful powers of conversation, and of making himself agreeable in any company with which he might be thrown. On this occasion he was not long silent. Before Harrow was passed, the occupants of the carriage, their reserve dispelled, and their tongues loosened by his jovial manners, were chatting away as eagerly and unrestrainedly as if they had known each other all their lives.

Legal men, especially barristers, are generally admitted to talk "shop" less than members of any other profession. Mr. Jones was no exception to this rule; yet it speaks well for his general fund of information and power of imparting it agreeably, that he could engage a party of strangers in conversation for nearly six hours. They had the carriage all to themselves, and stopped at few stations. Still of every place they passed he had something to say: some little anecdote, some historical allusion was always ready. At length, near the conclusion of the journey, one of the party brought up the subject of spirit-rapping, and, almost necessarily, of ghosts. One ghost story was followed by another, and the possibility of such phantoms appearing was eagerly discussed. Mr Joues denied their existeuce in toto. One of his companions took up the other side.

"As a proof," he said, "of their occasional appearance, I am now bound for a house in this neighborhood where a ghost has been seen by some of the members of the household whom I have known for years, and of whose veracity I have not the smallest suspicion;" and seeing his companions look incredulous, he added: "Some of you, gentlemen, may know this part of the country, and, if so, may have heard of the place. It is Elton Hall."

"What! Charley Ingram's?" said Mr. Jones.

"The same."

"I don't know the place, but I'm going there to-morrow. I shall hope to have a peep at the ghost."

"You would think it no joke, sir, if you really saw one."

"There I agree with you," said one of the others who had denied an existence to ghosts. "I am certain that if I saw anything pretending to be ghostly or supernatural, unbeliever as I am, I should feel, to say the least, very uncomfortable."

"Nothing supernatural could alarm me," replied Jones, "since nothing is supernatural; but, whatever fate may have in store for me to-morrow, for to-night at least I am safe, as I am going to sleep at the Trafalgar, and a hotel is the last place where one would expect to find a ghost."

"I don't despair of convincing you, after all," said the believer in apparitions, as the train glided into the L—— terminus. "We shall meet to-morrow. Good-night."

After shaking hands with his new acquaintance, Mr. Jones collected his luggage, and drove off to the hotel. Arrived there he found it quite full. The Assizes were to begin next day. He had, however, written to order a room, and declared his intention to remain. An altercation ensued. The waiter declared he could not take him in, and the master was in bed. A bribe availed when hard words were useless. The hotel-keeper was roused, and came grumbling down stairs. He found himself in a dilemma. He had received the letter, and had promised to keep a room for Mr. Jones. The latter had been expected some hours earlier. The room had been filled. Every room in the house had its occupant. The master himself was sleeping in a generally disused garret. How find room for another visitor! And yet to refuse, in defiance of a written promise, the celebrated Q. C., the leader of the circuit, a man whose custom had brought many "big wigs" to the house, and might bring many more, was not a method likely to raise the reputation of the Trafalgar. Mine host was puzzled. He tried to make excuses and apologies. "The place was never known so crowded. He had been obliged to send away several parties." But excuses and apologies were made in vain. The unfortunate landlord was in despair. At length an idea struck him. The coffee-room was already occupied by two gentlemen; beds had been hurriedly sent in; but if Mr. Jones would not mind waiting in the hall, he would see what could be done. He went away, and after a few minutes' absence, returned with the intelligence, that if Mr. Jones would not object to sleeping at the top of the house, there was a room at his disposal. All rooms were the same to Mr. Jones, so he followed the landlord up the stairs, the waiter preceding them with the luggage. Higher and higher they ascended: narrower and narrower became the stairs, till, at the last flight, they were little less steep than a ladder.

The room into which Mr. Jones was ushered, though low-pitched, was larger and more comfortable than could have been expected from its situation. A large double-bed stood in one corner. A bright fire blazed at the opposite end. On a table in the middle burnt two wax candles in silver candlesticks, and there were two or three easy chairs about the room. The only other noticeable article of furniture was a large cupboard or press standing against the wall, and projecting three feet from it. Jones was greatly surprised at finding himself in such comfortable quarters, and, being of a forgiving nature, determined to let the landlord off the wigging he had intended giving him the next morning.

"What would Mr. Jones please to take?"

"Nothing but tea, and bring it as quick as you can," replied that personage, to the great delight of the sleepy waiter, who hastened down stairs, followed by the landlord, who had just wished his guest good-night.

As soon as the tea came, Jones, who had in the meantime donned dressing-gown and slippers, took some voluminous papers from his portmanteau, and sitting down to the table applied himself diligently to their perusal, pausing at intervals to refresh himself with copious draughts of tea. He twice emptied the teapot before he had concluded his labors and laid aside the manuscripts. But although the town clocks had tolled "one," he did not go to bed, but paced up and down the room, sadly, no doubt, to the annoyance of the occupants of the room below. Jones was puzzled by the brief he had been studying, and "walking the quarter deck" was his usual method of invoking wisdom. His march was as usual accompanied by a soliloquy.

"Yes; it is very unlucky that in this case, the hardest I have undertaken for years, I should have had so little time for consideration. If I could only have seen Rodgers in town these difficulties would have been got over. What business has an attorney like that to be out of the way when he's wanted. Perhaps he may lose the case to his client by his folly. But that's not my fault. I will do all I can, and I think perhaps by laying great stress on the want of positive evidence I may get the man off. I can't think he's really guilty. What motive could he have had for the crime? A clerk in easy circumstances; 800*l.* a year, and with 500*l.* at his banker's at the time of his committing the alleged forgery of 20*l.*; not extravagant either, and always considered a steady young man. But there are some points about the case I don't see clearly yet. Perhaps I should have done better to have studied the brief in the train this evening; but then legal documents are conspicuous, and if the prosecutor's counsel (I believe they employ Hillyard) had happened to be in the same carriage he would have augured ill of our cause from seeing me get it up at the last moment, and we shall want——"

Here Mr. Jones' meditations were interrupted by a loud crack. He looked quickly round, and, not seeing anything, was about to resume his walk, when he noticed that the cupboard door had opened towards him. He pushed it to with a kick, and then proceeded:

"We shall certainly want every advantage we can get, and our adversaries are determined to do their best. I could almost fancy they have some motive in injuring the young man, and yet if we set up such a plea we could not support it. A delay——"

Another loud crack, and again the cupboard door flew open.

"The deuce take this door," said Mr. Jones, shutting it violently. "In these country places locks and hinges are always going wrong. Yes, a delay is what we want, and what I fear we shall not be able to get. If we had only some of these spirit-rappers that fellow talked about in the train."

Crack! crack! Mr. Jones turned sharply round towards the cupboard. He was in a different part of the room from where he had been when the door flew open before. He advanced toward the cupboard; his hand was raised to shut the door, when it gradually opened wider, wider, wider, and, as it did so, Mr. Jones did not close it, and put an immediate stop to its vagaries. No; he seemed rooted the spot. His head tingled; a cold sweat stood on his forehead; every drop of blood in his body seemed to fly to his heart; and, worse than all, a sensation of fear he had never before experienced caused him to stare, open-mouthed, and with an expression half-indicative of terror, at that awful opening. Well might he gaze in horror at the ghastly visitor who seemed to have risen from the grave at his command. A tall and lanky figure, enveloped in a white robe, and supporting a fleshless head, whose chattering teeth he could even then hear, extended its right arm and long bony fingers towards him, and pointed them at him in derision. Where was now that bold spirit that had prompted Jones to assert that nothing supernatural could alarm him, for that nothing was supernatural? Fled! vanished! as will always vanish such idle boastings when those who utter them are brought face to face with the objects they so lightly profess not to dread. He tried to speak, but his tongue refused to utter. He tried to scream, but the sounds stuck in his throat. Nearer and nearer came that hideous hand. More and more sardonic and exulting was the grin of that mocking skull. The wretched man felt, though he could hardly distinguish, its approach. Still he cannot move. His mental and bodily powers seem paralyzed. He is only conscious of the proximity of something horrible, from which there is no escape. An inch more and the hand will touch his face; that inch diminishes; the bony fingers are on his neck! and then, as if roused to desperation by that unearthly touch, he utters a frightful scream and falls senseless to the ground, as, with a sudden inclination, the dread spectre bends forward and clutches its victim in its hideous embrace.

The Trafalgar is a very large hotel. It can accommodate fifty people, but in the then crowded state of the house, at least half as many again were sleeping in it. But not one of these persons—not the gentleman for whom beds had been set up in the coffee-room—not the waiters whose "shake-down" had been prepared in the kitchen, were proof against the awful, ghastly, blood-curdling scream forced from Mr. Jones' lips at the moment when the paroxysm of his agony and despair was at its height. Every one heard it, and every one—even including the gouty old Judge on the first floor—rushed from their rooms to ascertain its cause. Such a sound was not the offspring of an idle terror. "Murder" was the word most frequently uttered by the guests, as, in various states, more or less scanty, of undress, they rushed up and down stairs, and along the dark corridors, ignorant, most of them, of the geography of the house, and, all of them, whence the shriek came.

That sound had not been repeated, and the silence succeeding it was more suggestive of violence, of murder, of death in some horrible form, than another scream would have been; for its repetition would have proved that he who uttered it yet lived, that assistance might yet come in time. But it is now with beating hearts, and inward thrills of dread of what they might discover, that the bravest look nervously into the different rooms as they pass, and it is noticeable that no one remains in a passage alone: the Judge, hobbling along a corridor, sees a light disappearing round the corner, and calls on the bearer to stop and let him see his way. Nothing but the fact that the candle-bearer is the Judge's confidential servant induces him to accede to the old gentleman's request, and had not people been too much excited to notice it, they might have observed that the legal luminary, before whom, later in the day, felons were to tremble, clung to his servant closer than could have been expected from one of generally such a distant and haughty bearing to his inferiors.

It is well known that if a person is woke out of a sound sleep by an unusual or alarming noise, he has always the vaguest idea as to whence it comes. Such was the case in this instance. The four persons who slept on the upper floor rushed immediately down stairs on hearing the scream, unconscious of the appalling drama that had been enacted at their very doors. It was not until a more organized search was made that the upper regions were explored, and several minutes elapsed before a nervous and excited crowd trooped up the ladder-like stairs we have before mentioned. With that strange infatuation which seems at such times to deprive people of their common sense, they examined the four small bedrooms on the upper landing before knocking at the closed door of Mr. Jones—which, after all, was near the stairs. When they did knock, no answer came to the summons. The door was bolted; there happened to be no key, and through the keyhole one man, a little braver than his comrades, ventured to peep, and was rewarded for his courage by perceiving the bright fire and blazing candles. The position of the door, in a recess, prevented his seeing more. Reassured by his description, the rest of the party were praiseworthy in their vigorous efforts to arouse the inmate by repeated and violent knocks at the door. At last the same high-spirited individual who had ventured to peep in gave the door a vicious kick. The bolt gave way and the door flew open. Curiosity now asserted itself over fear, and the whole party rushed into the room. But they were brought to a sudden check. What had they expected to see? None of them could have said exactly; but murder was the thought uppermost in their minds, and perhaps the sight of a man lying with his throat cut, a thin stream of blood meandering over the floor, and the murderer dragged from his concealment under the bed or amongst the curtains, would have realized their expectations tolerably well. Indeed, I fear that curiosity and a vague sense of importance at assisting, however obscurely, at such a denouement, would have been the prevailing feelings in their minds just then. But from this hard-heartedness they were spared by the nature of the scene before them—though assuredly nothing so pleasant as sense of importance was amongst those who crowded the chamber.

Before them, on the floor, lay the stunned and senseless figure of Mr. Jones, from whose face every vestige of color had fled. A sheet and a mass of broken bones almost concealed him, and a skull, which had fallen from the skeleton on to the table, seemed to sit there and mock the havoc it had created. A skeleton, did we say?—yes, and no more. Yet this object, the type of what we shall be ere a century has passed, inanimate, wonderful, and to be regarded reverentially by all who view it aright as a symbol of God's power and man's decay, had caused almost the death of one person there and even scared for some moments ten or a dozen others from approaching it.

That intrepid looker-on, whose bravery we have before had occasion to notice favorably, was the first who roused himself sufficieutly to assist in raisiug the fallen man from amidst the débris of bones which covered him. The others then took heart of grace and helped him, and before they left the room one of them actually had the hardihood to take up the skull and examiue it. In the meantime Mr. Jones had been carried to his bed. A doctor was sent for, who immediately ordered the room to be cleared, aud then told the landlord, who, in virtue of his position remained there, that Mr. Jones had evidently received a dreadful shock to the nervous system. Mr Jones' friends (did the landlord know them?) had better be communicated with and he would sit up with his patient all night. The host only knew Mr. Jones as an excellent customer, but he had the good sense to apply to the Judge, who had just turned into bed again, but who willingly roused himself to give the desired information about Jones' address, and a telegram being forthwith despatched thither, the first train from Loudon brought down several members of his family. Weeks passed before he could be moved from the hotel, months before he was sufficiently recovered to resume his profession. He never alluded to the occurrence of that night, but men noticed that he grew pale and tried to turu the conversatiou when any stranger iu his company brought up the subject of ghosts and apparitions. His nerves, too, and professional acumen were not what they had been, aud he was often obliged to refuse the briefs that poured in upon him. This was of the less consequence, inusmuch as he had already accumulated an ample fortune. He died in about two years' time of a heart complaint, brought on by the fright he had experienced that November evening in the Trafalgar Hotel at L——.

Is it necessary to add an explanation to this mystery, if mystery it can be called? If so, the explanation is quickly given. On Mr. Jones' arrival at the Trafalgar, the landlord, at his wits' end, bethought him of a young medical student who lodged in the large bedroom at the top of the house, and who had hired it for a permanency during the winter mouths. He was easily persuaded to give up his room for one night, and left the hotel to seek a lodging at the house of a friend, who, he knew, would take him in. But before going he turned, as he thought, securely, the key of the cupboard or press which contained his great treasure—a skeleton—skilfully put together with wires, the construction of which had been the employment of his leisure hours for some time. The cupboard, when not locked, shut with a hasp, rather out of order, and being somewhat too small for the skeleton, the door, pressing on the wires, caused the arm to force it open, and, eventually, to protrude itself as we have described, till the skeleton, losing its balance, fell forward on the unfortunate Jones, and the skull, detaching itself, remained on the table. The dismay of the student on learning the destruction of his cherished masterpiece was only surpassed by his horror at the effects it had produced, and of which he considered himself secondarily the cause. He afterwards rose to eminence in his profession, but never again did he venture to put a skeleton together.

The young man indicted for forgery was eventually acquitted. The dreadful accident which had happened to his counsel, and which made a profound sensation in the place, induced the judges to postpone the trial till the next assizes. In the interim fresh evidence was discovered, and the barrister who conducted the case for the defendant when it came on a second time, had no difficulty in obtaining a verdict of "Not Guilty" for his client.

So some good came out of a great evil. But the young man never thought of the catastrophe which had saved his name and prospects from being everlastingly blighted, without feeling that his acquittal had been purchased at the highest of all prices—the death, for so it proved, of a fellow-creature.

THE INTRODUCTORY PROCESS.

TO write a preface is, we take it, a work of some little difficulty. Not having time at present to consider why it should be a matter of any difficulty at all, we will, if you please, allow it to be so, and admit that, however easily and rapidly a subject may be treated, yet the introduction to it will probably require greater care and a more delicate handling. And this becomes eminently true in the case of almost all "social introductions," by which term we mean the ordinary introduction of number one to number three, by the intervention of number two.

Now, unless number one has requested number two for the favor of an introduction to number three, (in which case the first mentioned person can not be offended, save by a refusal,) number two should weigh well the responsibilities that he is about voluntarily to incur, by the reckless bringing together of two bodies who may already be antagonistic to one another. Let this be your canon, that you have no right to introduce two persons to one another, without the sanction of one, or both of them, or, perhaps of their undoubtedly best friends and well-wishers.

Let us consider, 1st. Of the person; i.e. who should be introduced, and to whom.

2d. Of the Medium; i.e.. whether tho introduction should be performed by us, or by any one better qualified for the office, by reason of his rank, station, or personal knowledge.

3d. The Tempus. As to the "when" of an introduction; i.e., whether you have chosen the fittest possible moment, or the most seasonable time for the ceremony.

4th. The Locus in Quo. As to the "where;" i.e., whether the place in which the contemplated introduction is to happen, is the most convenient, most advantageous spot that can possibly be selected.

5th. The Modus Operandi. As to the manner of proceeding with the rite; as to the order of names; as to their correct pronunciation; as to the number of times each is to be uttered; and upon whom devolves the duty of first speaking after the ceremony is at an end.

Surely the above considerations are sufficient to deter any fellow from rashly making known one fellow to another fellow, without previously ascertaining the wishes of either fellow on the matter in question.

Let us commence with an instance in point, where none of the considerations above enumerated enter into the operator's calculations. This we will call "The Careless Introduction."

Great care should be taken, previous to any unneccessary introduction, to ascertain the antecedent histories of the parties about to be made personally known to one another for the first time.

For instance, if A., walking with B., meets C., and if C., having stopped A., or A having stopped C., commences some street-conversation of the ordinarily vapid character, which, from the stagnation of ideas in the heads of both A. and C., comes to an abrupt conclusion, then it may occur to A., just by way of saying or doing something, to introduce his friend B. to C.

The inductive process to this rash headlong act of introduction, is somewhat as follows:

A., with B. on his arm, meets C. As neither C. nor A. have anything particular to do, they stop one another.

A. (as if surprised.) Hallo!

C. (without any meauing whatever.) Hallo! (Both smile and shake hands.)

B., who has not left A.'s arm, clings to him, as if fearing lest his friend should be taken away by C,; howbeit he looks another way, and wishes that some one would come and say, "How d'ye do" to him, so as to put him on an equal footing, as it were, with A.

A. (cheerily.) Well—and—how are you? Eh?

C. (with equal cheeriness.) Oh! I'm all right. (He emphasizes "I'm" pretty strongly, as much as to say that there are some people who are not all right.)

A. (as if much relieved.) Ah! Well, that's well. (Smiles patronizingly on C.)

B., who has been resting himself on his right leg, changes to his left leg, and begins to wish more than ever that he had somebody to talk to.

A. (trying to keep up the spirited dialogue.) And—er—so—you're— (He is just going to say "very well, eh!" but pulls up short.)

C. (feeling the onus of conversation thrown upon him.) You're all right, of course?

A. (resenting the idea that he must "of course" be all right.) Well—er—pretty well.

There has been nothing the matter with him, but still he does not like to feel that importance of his existence thus lowered before his friend B. B. smiles as if he'd like to join in the conversation, aud begins to think that he'd better walk on, and leave A. to follow.

C. Well—er—(looks at B. as if to ask what the deuce he means by it. B. pretends to be abstracted in contemplation of things in general, and shifts back from his left to his right leg.) Oh, I say, old fellow. (This is said confidentially to A., to show B. on what intimate terms of friendship they are. B. begins to be jealous, and gives up the notion of quitting A.'s arm.) I saw your cousin the other day.

A. (who has about fifty or sixty cousins, pretends great interest.) Oh! did you really?

A. throws in "really" to balance the sentence, as, of course, C. either did see his cousiu really, or he did not at all.

C. (who has nothing else to say on the subject.) Yes, I did.

A. (without the smallest curiosity.) Oh!

B. shifts from his right to his left leg, and slightly presses A.'s arm. It suddenly occurs to A. that B. and C. ought to know one another. C. is just about to say "good-by," but hesitates, seeing that A. looks as if he had got something to say.

A. (to C.) You know my friend B., don't you?

Rather a weak question, as, if he had known him, he would of course have spoken to him, unless there were reasons for silence.

C. (trying to appear interested in removing any such impression from A.'s mind.) No—I—er—

B. smiles slightly, theu suddenly becomes very grave, and looks steadily at C., as if waiting for a signal to jump on him.

A. Oh! (Affably.) Then let me introduce you.

Here A. suddenly becomes bothered as to which of the two ought to be mentioned first; whether he shall introducc B. to C. or C. to B.; and feels an inclination to pull them forcibly together, or to double them backwards and forwards, "Mr. B., Mr. C., Mr. C., Mr. B., now you know one another!" after the fashion supposed to be genteel and correct on the stage. C. and B. get him out of the difficulty, by taking off their hats to one another, with grim politeness, during which ceremony A. says quietly, as if to himself, and having no sort of reference to the action, "C., B.," and then, as if he had just wound up a couple of wax-work figures, waits to see what will happen next.

B. (glad to get a chance of saying something.) I think we've met before at—(forgets where.)

C (who hasn't the slightest recollection of it.) Ah—at—er—yes, yes—

B. (quite agrees with him, and A. is delighted.) Yes. I thought I knew your face.

C. (not particularly pleased, smiles.) Ah! Yes—I—(wants to say "thought I knew your face," but remembering that B. has just made that observation, alters the form.) Yes, I thought I'd seen you somewhere.

N. B. This is a very safe remark.

A. (stultifying himself on the spot.) Oh! I didn't know you knew one another.

C. (pleasantly.) Oh, dear, yes—and—er—(conclusively.) Oh, dear yes—(feeling that he has quite enough of B., says suddenly to A.) Good-by.

B. wonders whether he'll say good-by to him.

C. (being doubtful as to whether he ought to shake hands with B., gives up the point altogether, and shakes hands with neither. Then, going, says to B., with a nervous sort of laugh, as if there was some kind of a joke in saying it.) Good-by. Delighted to have made your—er—(hurries off.)

B. (speaking at the same moment.) Delighted to have—er—(goes in the opposite direction with A.)

C. (to himself, going down the street.) I wonder what the deuce that fellow's name was?

B. (to A.) Who was that to whom you introduced me, eh?

Of course they won't speak when they meet again: but of this matter more anon.

This is what we have called The Careless Introduction, though, luckily, in this instance, unattended by any awkward circumstances.

But supposing that the following scene had occurred:

A. (to C.) You know my friend B., don't you?

C. (sarcastically.) Oh! is that B.? ha! ha! (laughing unpleasantly) and your friend (horribly emphasized) too? ha! ha!

A. (bewildered.) Eh! why—I (takes off his hat, and puts it on again for no particular reason.)

B. (who, having disengaged himself from A.'s arm, approaches C. viciously.) So, sir we do meet, do we? (fumbling in his pocket) You may remember what I promised you—(fumbling harder than ever in his coat tails) a horse—(fumbling in his breast pocket) a horse-whipping (discovers that this is the only day for the last six weeks that he has come out without the horsewhip.)

C. (sneeringly.) If you dare—

B. (furiously.) Dare!!—I'll—

A. But can't—won't—(words fail him; he is pushed aside by B.)

B. (to A. violently.) I beg, sir, you'll not meddle.

Crowd (who have quickly collected, addressing A.) You get out, will yer? (A. regards them indignantly.)

C. (trembling with suppressed rage.) I have no wish for a street row. (About to move off.)

Crowd (disappointed.) Yah! (to B.) Give it him, little 'un.

A. Quite right, (to C.) You'd better go, we can settle it quietly.

C. (vociferating.) Quietly! It's through you, sir, (to A.) that—

B. You're a coward, sir! (to C.)

C. (saying something fierce indistinctly.) Thro-o-o-o— } Together.
A. (addressing both.) But look here, you know— } Together.
Crowd (delighted.) Hooray! don't stand uonc of his nonsense. (Alluding to A.) } Together.

Policeman (suddenly appearing on the scene.) Now what's all this here?

Crowd (giving A. into custody.) That's him, Peeler!

Little boy (gratuitously.) I seed him do it.

Policeman (in an off-hand manner.) Here, I can't have any of this 'ere obstruction no longer, (to C.) Now, sir, do you give this person in charge? (alluding to A.)

C. (who would like to do it very much, but is withheld by a stern sense of justice.) No.

Policeman. Well, then (in a conciliatory tone;) don't go a loitering any longer. Come (to the crowd,) you move on now, there ain't nothing; move on, or I'll have some on you in two two's, I will. (Exeunt little boys hastily, and the party breaks up, B. having vanished some time since.)

B. and C. will henceforth always speak of A. as a meddling fellow. And A. will have learnt the lesson that no introduction must be entered upon without due care, and conscientious observance of all the precautions hereinbefore set down. We will renew this most important subject at some future, but no very distant, time.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1865.

"AN ANTI-SLAVERY DICTIONARY."

WE had imagined that no schoolboy in the country could fail to have been fully enlightened on the relations of the two American Dictionary parties, after the deluge of advertisements, circulars and agents that has swept over the country in order to bring the merits of the great orthographic question before the people; and the question, we supposed, had finally come down to an issue, one side of which, (Worcester,) was defended by Boston learning rallying around Harvard, while the other, (Webster,) was sustained by New Haven and Yale.

Our ignorance has, however, been astonished into a sense of its own depth, by an article which appeared last Tuesday in the Examiner of this city. It appears that the Webster people have, in their last edition, published certain cuts to show the physiognomical character of the different races. Among these, discarding the Blumenbach classification, a delineation of what is called the Caucasian type is given. The drawing represents the Caucasian in a way that might lead one to suppose that he had some African blood in his veins. The cut is very poor, and, as an exposition of any fact in ethnology, singularly unfortunate. We do not feel able to indicate whence the emendator of Webster procured his ideas on the subject, and are half inclined to suspect that the printer, being unable to work up some old portrait of a negro genius in any other way, locked it into the pictorial page of Webster. The Examiner, however, sees something more in the matter than a mere Dioscurian heresy. To him, it appears that the Webster people are trying to foist upon the white race a negro ancestry. He gets sarcastic about it, and charges Boston, the "Hub of the Universe," and sink of abolition, miscegenation, and wickedness generally, with the getting up of the Quarto Dictionary. He says:

"All honor then, to these learned Professors! All honor to the central 'Hub!' They have settled a much vexed question. They have given us a solution to the most difficult problem of the age. When the Abolition enthusiasts and pulpit stumpers told us a white man was nearly as good as a negro, if the former behaved himself, we set it down to the ill effects of fanaticism and bigotry."

Biting as is this irony, it is somewhat obscure, especially in the last sentence, which may mean that if an Abolition enthusiast behaved himself, "we (the editor of the Examiner) set it down to the ill effects of fanaticism and bigotry." We like to see Boston amour propre wounded, when the tormentor can do it elegantly. If Poe were alive, we would thank him for his untiring efforts in that direction. But to make us relish any exhibition of anti-Boston wit, the performer must act, as Ik Walton would with a frog from the Common pond, using the Yankee metropolis as "though he loved her."

Worcester has received the warm approval and endorsement of every Harvard professor, and is declared authority in matters of orthography by every journal in Boston. We remember seeing a criticism in the Atlantic some time since, which stigmatized Websterian spelling as "provincial." Every man whose name is connected with Webster's Dictionary as collaborator is or has been a Yale professor, and New Haven should be made to feel all the weight of the Examiner's ethnographic thunder.

MISS KING'S READINGS.—Miss King gave her first reading in California, in Platt's Hall on Tuesday evening. Her audience was large and of a personnel very complimentary to the fair reader. She was introduced by the Rev. Mr. Stebbins, who briefly and gracefully recognized the tribute of so large an audience as in memoriam of the genius of her lamented brother. Miss King's voice—without possessing the sonorous qualities which distinguished her brother's—is clear and flexible, her enunciation is distinct and positive, and she has an honest laugh which appeared to exercise a pleasant magnetism over her audience. Without exhibiting the direct insight of genius, her dramatic and humorous conceptions were very truthful, and seemed to satisfy her audience. Miss King reads again at Maguire's Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening, July 25th.

MOUNTAIN IMAGERY.

THE Fourth of July, 1865, was the occasion of the delivery of a poem at Crystal Peak, by L. Kords. We do not know whether Mr. Kords has ever before written poetry, nor are we prepared to believe that his name in its present etymological deficiency, is altogether suggestive of those "chords" which we are told pertain to the poet's lyre. Enough, that at Crystal Peak, Mr Kords certainly attained, by virtue of his locality, a greater altitude than usually falls to the lot of most Fourth of July poets. It is not at all improbable that the occasional vagueness of his statements may have been owing to a veiling of his cloudy eminence, or that his frequent exhilleration may not have been the result of his remarkable atmospheric elevation We are told that the usual effect of these extraordinary heights is to produce singing in the ears, vertigo and hemorrhage from the nose, and we may reasonably place Mr. Kords' production among this class of phenomena.

Mr. Kords begins by telling us that "in the days gone by a vacant dread," had pressed him down "till all his thoughts were dead."

> "A vacant fear which I could not explain—
> Could not forget, but would return again—
> Till every sense was numb;"

The mere superficial observer would hardly imagine that this oppressive vacancy was exactly a favorable condition for the conception of a poem; but therein he would show his ignorance. We perfectly agree with Mr. Kords' statement of his situation, and deeply sympathize with him. There have been times when we, too, have felt that "all we saw seemed dread to charge" us "with an added awe," and are pleased to know that at this time we must have closely approximated to poetry. But Mr. Kords uses this interval of vacancy to entertain such unpleasant company as which came in a "crowded tumult" to his bosom, and from which his only relief was to turn back to history's page. It may be remarked that this is usually the poetical panacea: we do not remember of anybody in this predicament who did not immediately consult "history's page," instead of his physician. Naturally Mr. Kords takes a view of the rebellion, and introduces the following episode:

> "Deep wrong and vengeance, wrath and blight and shame" .

> "I well remember when I crossed the main
> To see my parents and my home again,
> An aged mother's grief, who lost her boy,
> Her only son and, too, her only joy.
> * * * * * *
> Five years since we had parted, passed away,
> And she had changed from vigor to decay;
> Her form erect was bent, her locks were white,
> Her spirit laden with a killing blight,
> She raised her sunken eyes to my salute,
> And when she knew me, wept in grief acute.
> Then through her sobbing, with her cheek all wet,
> Spoke these lone words, which I shall ne'er forget:
> 'My Henry, Louis, he is gone, is dead;
> 'On Vicksburg's fatal plain low lies his head:
> 'It seems I reared him but that he he shot;
> 'I could have spared him had he loved me not.
> 'Though absent long, your home you come to see,
> 'But Henry never can return to me.'
> I did not dare to venture on relief,
> O'erawed I stood by her majestic grief."

We are here obliged to disagree with Mr. Kords. We do not think the adjective "majestic" sufficiently describes the grief of this remarkable woman.

> "It seems I reared him but that he he shot" is a purely philosophical reflection worthy of Mr. Emerson, and very forcibly foreshadows the inevitable Fate which seems to have been waiting for the infelix Henry from his birth, while the statement,

> "I could have spared him if he loved me not,"

though at the first glance it might seem unmaternal and selfish, partakes largely of that highly intellectual character which invests the Roman matron. We consider this as one of the finest touches in the poem, and the artful introduction of the poet's Christian name, Louis, (i. e. L. Kords,) into this speech gives it that easy, conversational quality suitable to a pioneer community.

But even the effect of this strong-minded mother's sorrow was not lasting. The poet continues:

> "Betimes some little bird would come and sing
> Of joy and beauty in the happy spring,
> And with its music, for a season brief,
> Bring welcome respite to a glad relief."

Both here and in a previous passage, Mr. Kords seems to have confounded "betimes" with "oftimes," but the statement in the last line is so astounding as to overshadow all other peculiarities. We cannot imagine what "a welcome respite to a glad relief" possibly can be, unless the poet means that while this manner of relieving his feelings was highly satisfactory to himself, a respite therefrom was equally felicitous to others—a theory in which we in a measure concur. Leaving these bucolic pleasures as unworthy of him, Mr. Kords instantly plunges into the horrors of war, and sees great ships > ——"cleaving the purple tide,

> Sending destruction out on either side;
> With monster guns, like roaring dogs of hell,
> Hurling afar the screaming shot and shell."

We have heard of many surprising qualities attributed to Cerberus, but this Paixhan-like faculty of hurling shot and shell is certainly novel, and considering that he had three heads and would have been to a certain extent a revolver, the spectacle becomes fearful. But this figure only serves as introductory to a well known hero:

> "'Mid hail of bullets, paying out with cut, > Rushed on to victory, brave Farragut!"

But here Mr. Kords leaves abstract principles and begins to individualize. From this point, any reader of patriotic poetry can safely predicate what is to follow. Sherman, Grant and Sheridan are in turn introduced, and like the usual pyrotechnic displays of the occasion, the whole concludes with an apotheosis of Lincoln, a temple of Liberty and a flight of highly-colored poetical rockets. Nevada is not forgotten at the last moment, the poet alluding to her "women peerless and her pleasures hale" and concluding with the following peroration:

> "I love that banner which forever nigh,
> Flouts like a song upon Nevada's sky,
> Still bright and cheering as when first I saw,
> A pledge of liberty, respect and law.
> Thus may it wave forever on this day,
> With countless millions to adore and pray!
> And be so base who would not gladly die
> To keep it thus in angel purity,
> Should sink down, down the yawning pits of hell,
> Of horrors which the guilty soul can tell;
> To where black serpents, in their venom fresh,
> And yelling devils tear the crawling flesh.
> Flag of the mighty! thus thy folds unfurled,
> Thou art the glory of this sunny world.
> Thine are the nation's prayers: thine, thine alone;
> We kneel, we worship at thine altarstone,
> And gladly follow thy ennobling call,
> With thee to conquer or with thee to fall.

And here we pause with Mr. Kords. The poem contains some 300 lines and occupies a column and a half of the Washoe Times. If we have seen fit to treat certain paragraphs of it lightly, it is but just to the poet to say that we have also been struck with a sense of its sincerity and manliness, and that, even with its infelicities, as a whole it has not been surpassed by any cotemperaneous Fourth of July poem delivered on the Pacific Slope.

PERILS OF A POEM.—On the 1st of July, THE CALIFORNIAN reprinted a poem entitled "Going to Sleep," taken verbatim from the columns of the New York Leader, and accredited to "Florence Percy." The San Francisco News Letter of the 15th inst., charges THE CALIFORNIAN with having copied this poem from the Atlantic Monthly, where it originally appeared, and having garbled it in reprinting. We were at first inclined to admit the fact of having carelessly copied an imperfect version, but on looking over the News Letter of the 1st of July, we were amazed by finding the identical verses published therein without credit, and consequently with not only the responsibility of the blunders, but the authorship of the poem quietly assumed by that paper. While this circumstance might have been the result of a generous courtesy toward the authoress, and a magnanimous presumption that she could not have possibly written such bad lines, or while the poem might have modestly been considered good enough for the News Letter, but not quite up to the reputation of "Florence Percy," a number of perplexing questions nevertheless arise. It is by no means clear that the verses were not written by the editor of the News Letter; nor are we certain that "Florence Percy" is not his nom de plume. While we are anxious to atone for our inadvertency, the present perplexing aspect of the case renders us unable to determine to whom to apologize or what to apologize for.

THE LAUREATE CRUSHED.—"Amigo" the San Francisco correspondent of the Gold Hill News, in alluding to a recent dramatization of Enoch Arden in this city, says:

"Enoch Arden in its natural state is about as stupid as anything the Poet Laureate ever wrote, and the dramatist, in adapting it to the stage, and changing it from dreary verse to dreary prose, did not lose sight of the distinguishing characteristics of the work."

As remarks of this kind must be calculated to embitter the existence of Alfred Tennyson, perhaps it was not quite right for "Amigo" to allow his criticism to go beyond the "dramatization"—its legitimate limits. We can imagine that Enoch Arden would seem "dreary" to one who can describe in the same letter the shooting of Billy Mulligan as "a relishable amusement," or whose remarkable experience leads him to state in regard to the same affair, that he "never saw a man killed so dead before," whatever this singular comparative statement may mean. But the real object of "Amigo's" criticism, i e., to show that he had read Enoch Arden, is altogether unsuccessful.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

MISS Lucy Simons' debut, as "Elvira," in I Puritani, on Saturday evening last, was an artistic success. Her voice is somewhat thin and deficient in strength and volume, but is well cultivated, and was most artistically managed. The debutante reudered the character with great self-possession, and displayed considerable dramatic power. Morelli and Orlandini sang the celebrated "Suoni la tromba" with wonderful effect, although the introductiou of American flags, as an adjunct to the effect of the scene, was an anachronism in questionable taste, to say the least. However, the duo (aud the flags) won the most tumultuous applause of the season.

On Monday evening the new season, with Brambilla as prima donna, began. The house was crowded, and the fair artiste was almost buried with flowers. The prima donna, tenor and baritone were in a state of constant trepidation and anxiety in regard to the bouquets, which were hurtled like bombshells through the air, to the immineut danger of their persons. We suggest the substitution of some opera that permits the weariug of helmets and mail by the principal characters on such occasions. Signorina Brambilla and Signors Morelli and Sbriglia cleverly performed their respective parts. Lucia di Lammermoor was very ably reudered on Wednesday evening. On Thursday evening Gottschalk's concert drew a good audience. Last night Ernani was given, and to-night La Traviata is to be the attraction.

The rapid production and constant change of operas, rendered neccssary by the requirements of the musical public, demand an unusual amount of labor by the troupe, chorus and orchestra. They have constantly three or four operas in study or rehearsal, which are seldom produced but for one or two nights, and are then put back to give place to others. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the troupe in general for their ability and competency. Mr. Reiff, the conductor of the orchestra, has also won the praise of the opera patrons by his peculiar merit in his preseut position.

A portion of the company, consisting of Signorina Scoucia, Miss Adelaide Phillips, Signors Morley, Orlandini and Fossati, have branched off for the iuterior, and are now giving operatic performances at Stockton. They will visit Sacramento during the coming week. They cannot fail in being greeted with a warm reception in these places—at this season of the year.

THE SHENANDOAH.—If any doubt ever existed as to the prowess of Southern chivalry in the field, no one cau deny that iu piracy and marine larcenies, it has not only fully established its pre-eminence, but vividly recalled the glorious days of Lafitte, Kidd and Blackbeard. The whale ship Milo brings the uews of the capture and burning of nine whalers by the pirate Shenandoah, commauded by the chivalrous and redoubtable Waddell. Waddell seems to have combined with an ardent love of country, a sincere regard for other people's money, and to have blended with the enthusiasm of the patriot the quick perceptions of a foot-pad. Captain Waddell took Captain Tucker's pocket money, ninety dollars, and on being solicited to restore a portion of it, at least enough to keep Tucker from destitutiou on his arrival here, eloquently replied:

"No, sir, your people have beggared me and my family, and taken away all our property, aud I can't see any good reason for accommodating you."

While we admire the logic of Captain Waddell, we can hardly give him credit for originality. We believe this kind of argument has obtained extensively among the Diggers, the Patagonians and certain tribes in the interior of Africa. We understand that the Shenandoah received supplies from the English penal colonies, and that a portion of its crew, consistently, came from the same place. It appears, also, that Waddell, although informed of the capture of Richmond and the downfall of the Confederacy, expressed a wish to fight it out on his owu hook. There is some prospect that this hook may be attached to the yard-arm of some Fedcral man-of-war, as, if the fact of Waddell's cognizance of the proclamation can be proven, no country with which the U. S. has any extradition treaty can give an asylum to the pirate aud freebooter.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE AT THE FAIR.—Some features are to be introduced of a new and novel natnre to most of our citizens, at the Industrial Fair which is to open its season on the 10th of August. A portion of the building has been assigned to the ladies, who will fit up and keep in operation a New England Kitchen in the style of the olden time, with cider, and good old-fashioned edibles for refreshment. What appetites our young gallants will have, especially if the attendants be fair ones! Occasional quilting, apple-paring, singing and dancing parties, all in antique style and costume, will be gotten up, also. The Pavilion is now in readiness for the reception of machinery and imperishable articles. Owing to the numerous applications, a new wing has been added to the Pavilion, in size 60 by 90 feet, making the entire area now inclosed upwards of 60,000 square feet. Specimens of the gold and silver medals to be awarded may be seen at Tucker's.

UNDER THE WEATHER.

A FIT of sickness is apt to enlarge a man's capacity for observation and impression. Even an ordinary cold will sometimes go far toward finishing his education. To poor people sickuess is often a refining process; it tones down organizations where the animal predominates; reflection and reading is encouraged, and the patient is isolated from the temptations and distractions of cheap pleasure. I don't mean those common inflammatory disturbances which throw up temporary baricades in all the avenues of expression without affecting any constitutional reform, but a sickness that shall throw you over on your side like the strapped Cruiser, and indulge in cruel aggravations over your helpless form. A man under such circumstances will receive moral ethics with his calomel, and take in grains of wisdom with his quinine.

Some people take sickness as a personal affront. Physicians will tell you that it is difficult to make certain individuals believe that there is not a peculiarity about their symptoms which at once segregates them from the great mass of suffering humanity and renders their case particularly difficult to treat. There are others who go to the opposite extreme, who have all the symptoms which affect their friends, aud who show their good faith and sincerity by swallowing their medicines. But I propose to give a few of the psychological phenomena, leaving out those dreadful symptoms which are thrown up in inverted pyramids in Ayer's, Brandeth's and Sands' advertisements, aud which you meet in all the medical books:

To lie awake with a strong consciousness that you ought to be asleep. To be morbidly alive to distant footsteps, to the rumble of carriage wheels and the half-hummed chants of obscure night birds going home to roost. To hear the ticking of near clocks and the hour tolled from the Cathedral tower, takeu up by smaller chimes, and closed, after a minute's lapse, when you are trying once more to shut the windows of your soul, by some laggard and reluctant clock in your neighborhood. To listen to all the fire alarms, and speculate upon the locality and the probability of the fire spreading. To settle in your mind the best place to tie your sheets and coverlid if obliged to make your escape by the window. To be immediately afterward precipitated into a doze, and dream that you have done so, but are embarrassed by the lightness of your apparel. To have a deep scorn for others who are asleep and to have a strong conviction that sleep is the natural refuge for stupidity. To hear people laugh in the street aud to feel personally aggrieved at their levity. To have a strong dispositiou to sit up, and upon doing so to have an equal disposition to lie down again and try it all over. To notice the last stroke of the mason's trowel on the ceiling aud have a strong inclination to match the wall paper more correctly. To have the shadowy bed curtains suggest outlines of concealed figures. To notice a crack in your dressing case that you never noticed before. To catch a sight of somebody's face in the glass, which you at first can't recognize as yourself. To unravel the bed-quilt. To stop suddenly in that interesting occupation with a dim recollection that this action is mentioned in the medical books as the last fatal symptom of a declining patient.

When you have been in this way for a few days, a medical man will come to see you who will talk to you generally as if you were a "three-year child," and treat you as if he considered you an idiot. He will address his remarks to others rather than yourself, and occasionally ignore your presence entirely. His actions will leave the impression on your mind that he thinks you are averse to getting well, and must be coaxed or eventually coerced into a healthy condition. He will joke with you, perhaps, with such a palpable intention to make you laugh that you will feel like crying. He will call his powders "little," under the mistakeu belief that they will be more acceptable. He will tell you that "we" must take care of "ourselves," and hand you something to make "us" sleep. This metaphorical sympathy with your condition will at first make you smile; but if you look at him closely and he be a clever man, you will see that this is simply a formula, and that under all there is a quiet watchfulness and quick perception, and meeting his eye at last you will understand one another, and you will like him better. If you subsequently get his good graces, he will tell you how all doctors have to fence with their patients, and may impart to you a few secrets of his trade which you think clergymeu and lawyers might profit by.

If you are not so sick but that you can take your prescription to the chemist yourself, you will add something valuable to your experience. As you stand before the clean counter of the man of drugs, you will be able to detect, from the faces of the customers, which one is getting a prescription for himself. You will observe that in such cases the customer wears a look of anxiety and curiosity which he never has when a simple agent. You will yourself look narrowly at the bottles from which the druggist compounds your prescription, and if your knowledge of the Latin terminatious be limited, you will be unnecessarily awed by their mysterious inscriptions. You will wonder if the druggist ever makes mistakes—if he ever puts up Sugar of Lead for Magnesia. You will perhaps meet one or two simple minded individuals, who will insist upon detailing their disorders to the druggist, as if it were to guide him in some mysterious way in the preparation of their prescriptions. But your prescription is ready, and as with the taking of medicine the psychological effects I have thus far recorded give way to mere physical phenomena, we find it convenient at this poin to finish our record.

ARCADIA REVISITED.

AH, here's the spot—the very tree
Where once I carved an L. and E.,
Symbolical of her and me
Bound in Love's rosy fetters;
Since then five weary years are spent,
And yet, I think we're both content
That in Love's Book we never went Beyond our simple letters.

For, looking through the rustling leaves,
I see the humble cottage eaves
Where now my Em. no longer weaves
Her mystic maiden fancies,
But milks her cows—she called 'em kine
In the brave days when she was mine—
But now she's dropped those phrases fine
She borrowed from romances.

Yet here's the place—the very tree
Where once I fell on bended knee
And breathed my burning vows—while she Stood by in pale pink muslin.
I kissed her hand—but why revamp
Old feelings now?—the grass is damp,
And what with this rheumatic cramp
To kneel now would be puzzling.

She walks no more 'neath starlit skies,
She calls the evening mists that rise
Miasma, and the dew that lies
Is damp and cold and shocking.
She now wears boots. Five years ago
Her skirts she gathered up below;
'Twas not from dampness, but to show
Her slippers and white stocking.

Beneath this shade we used to read
"Maud Muller," and we both agreed
The Judge was wrong—but why proceed?
She's married to another!
She has not pined—that form is stout
That once this arm was clasped about.
She has two girls; they're both, no doubt,
The image of their mother!

She said she loved not "wealth or state,"
But most adored the "wise and great,"
And gave a look to intimate
That this was my complexion;
"Her husband should be eyed like Mars,"
That's he, there, letting down the bars,
In cowhide boots. No doubt her Pa's
But O, not her selection!

And yet, am I her young love's dream:
The pensive lover that did seem
The rightful Prince who should redeem
The promise of her faneies?
Am I that same dyspeptic youth
Who rang the chimes on "sooth" and "truth,"
Minus that cuspidate tooth
Whose presence kills romances?

O Love, behind you leafy screen!
Why can't all trees be evergreen?
Why can't all girls be sweet sixteen,
All men but one-and-twenty?
Why are the scars that hearts must wear
Deeper than those you tree may bear?
And why are lovers now so rare,
And married folk so plenty!

POPULAR JOURNALS.—Under this title, the Dramatic Chronicle condenses an argument which might have been longer, but which we doubt could have been more fairly or concisely expressed, than in the following few words:

"Every journal of course, wants to be popular, because all journals are published as business enterprises, and popularity is generally an essential element of success. But there are two kinds of popularity, which are reached by quite different paths. The one is a present ephemeral popularity, which may be won by truckling to the popular feeling of the hour, and by a time-serving, timid, cringing course generally: by taking care to offend no one who is rich or influential, to express no opinions until they have become recognized or fashionable; by sacrificing convictions for au advertisement, and suppressing wholesome truth for fear of offending a subscriber. The other is an enduring popularity, which brings with it not only prosperity, but influence and power for good; and it is only to be gained by a fair, conscientious, considerate and independent course; by speaking of friends and foes alike, with justice and candor; by so eschewing the influences of prejudice and personal feeling, that the community shall learn to respect and confide in the statements and opinions published. The former is the policy for journals designed to last for a month or a year; the latter, for those that aspire to a long, healthy and honorable career.

AN AUSTRALIAN ADVENTURE.

WE went out on board the Beagle on the third voyage that she made, and after she had become famous in the history of navigation and the geographical discoveries of our country.

The first time the Beagle sailed from England was in the year 1826. She started, with the Adventure, to explore the Straits of Magellan, the western coasts of Patagonia, and the Terra del Fuego. The two vessels returned toward the close of 1830. In December of the following year the Beagle was again fitted out, and sent to explore the principal groups of islands in the Pacific, especially the Society Islands, and a portion of Australia. She returned in the autumn of 1835. In 1837 she sailed again for Australia, and this third voyage my friend Fitzmaurice and myself undertook together. I have spoken of the previous voyages she made, although in no way connected with the incident I am about to relate, from that feeling of affection which every person gets for the ship that has borne him gallantly through storm and danger, and been a veritable home during long and eventful months.

The scientific knowledge of my friend, his talent as an artist, his spirit and energy, had early made him considered one of the most useful members of the expedition. During the exploration of the southern coast of Australia, toward the west of the gulf, between Aruhim and Van Diemau's Land, he fulfilled with great success several important missions, and, in particular, discovered the source of the stream called Adelaide river in honor of the Queen Dowager of England.

One day, in this region, he and I were out together in a boat, at the further extremity of a little bay, in order to compare the com asses and measure the declinations.

Fitzmaurice had tried to take a position on the group of hills known as Escape Cliffs, but the iron ore in the rocks made the needles of the magnet deviate so much that we were obliged to establish ourselves upon a bank of sand on the shore of the bay.

We had been working hard for several hours; night began to approach; the moon rose in all the full splendor peculiar to that latitude, and it was time for us to think of taking our departure.

I started for the boat, carrying with me one of the instruments, while Fitzmaurice lingered for a few minutes, gazing about him, entranced by the beauty of the scene which appealed so strongly to his artistic fancy.

I had almost reached the boat when there suddenly rose behind me a terrible clamor of human voices. I have no hesitation in avowing that the unexpected tumult, in the midst of the tranquility and solitude, sent a thrill of terror to my very marrow. I believe that the strongest nerves of the bravest man that ever lived could not have resisted that first impulse of horror at the terrible cries which so suddenly broke the stillness.

I turned, and upon the summit of the cliffs above Fitzmaurice saw a large number of the natives, armed with javelins, which they seemed just ready to aim at my unfortunate comrade, while uttering those fiendish yells of rage and triumph.

I could have fled, gained the boat, and soon put the length of the bay between myself and danger, but, thank God, not even for a second did the cowardly thought cross my mind.

I did not stop to think; I saw only my friend, alone, unarmed, exposed to the fury of these merciless savages, and, flinging down my burden, I ran back to share his fate, whatever it might be. The nearer I reached the place the more imminent the peril appeared.

One of the natives, who looked like the animating spirit of a troop of demons, was harranguing his companions with ferocious energy, his gestures plainly showing that he was urging them to assault us without delay.

The whole band grew more and more excited. They struck the rocks with their javelins, rolled their fierce eyes like enraged wild beasts, turning their heads to and fro, and biting the extremities of their beards, signs of the most profound irritation among that race.

When I reached the spot where Fitzmauriee stood quiet and unshaken as a Roman sentinel, they had descended the cliffs until they were grouped not more than twenty feet above our heads, in a position where the first dash of their weapons could not fail to transfix us both.

They hesitated there for an instant; perhaps some fear of the reprisals which the English ship might make caused them to pause, but the old man burst forth again in what sounded like fierce invective. The cries of the whole band redoubled; they made another plunge forward, and a score of murderous javelins were leveled at us where we stood.

"Quick! quick!" I cried; "we must either fight or run."

But, alas, our guns were not within reach; the first attempt toward flight would have been the signal for a deadly volley.

"For God's sake," I continued, "what shall we do? Try to climb the rocks."

"No, no," returned Fitzmaurice, and his voice sounded so cold and firm that I started with a stranger feeling of terror than the sight of the savages had given me. "We can't fight—no use to run—dance and sing—dance, I say!"

My first thought was that the horror of the moment had turned my companion's brain.

"Maurice! Maurice!" I groaned, "are you crazy?"

"Dance! dance!" was his only answer.

Without a word more he began a rapid dance, singing a sailor's song, and laughing in the most uproarious manner He struck into the quickest and most fantastic of all the sailor jigs we had seen performed on the vessel, snapping his fingers and executing pigeon-wings and double-shuffles in a way that, at another time, would have convulsed me with laughter. I stood for an instant stupefied with horror. I could neither stir nor utter a sound.

"Dance! dance!" cried Fitzmaurice.

His voice seemed to rouse me. I think the agony I endured for his sake must have made me as insane as I believed him, for I began to dance almost as wildly as he, but to sing or laugh was impossible. My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I forgot my dread of the savages—the peril which menaced us—in the terror of the idea that Fitzmaurice had lost his reason.

"It may quiet them," he sang after a moment; "they are crazy as children for a dance—jump, skip!"

I began to collect my thoughts and be able better to understand Fitzmaurice's strange performance. I now glanced towards the savages. The unexpected sight had evidently struck them with surprise; some of them had dropped their javelins, others leaned over the rocks in wrapt attention. The old man and a few of the leaders still continue to expostulate with their companions, but these no longer listened, pushing back the infuriated commanders when they attempted to fling their javelins.

The savages, like the aborigines of all those strange lands, were only children of a larger growth. The slightest thing amused them or excited their choler, and often they could be turned from grave enterprises by the most trifling occurrence. They sought now to understand the odd scene. What were those two men about? What meant those leaps, those wild movements, that gay song which Fitzmaurice still continued in full vigor, occasionally varying it with a whistle loud and clear as a bird's melody. The crowd began to express their curiosity by little cries, rather sweeter to our ears than the yells of rage and menace with which they had made the night horrible only a little time before. The principal amusement of the Australians was the dance, and this new one performed before their eyes, had all the merit of originality; truly, it must have been a singular spectacle. By this time I understood everything, and now that my fear for my friend's sanity had changed into admiration for the presence of mind which had saved our lives, or at least given us this respite, I was able to join more heartily in his exercise, and even aid him in the vocal part of the performance. At length Fitzmaurice, who never during an instant evinced the slightest sign of emotion, called, or rather sang, as if a portion of the tune he had been shouting, with all the strength of his lungs:

"Where are our guns?"

"About thirty feet off!" I chanted in answer.

"Which way?" pealed back his deepest baritone.

"Toward the left," responded my tenor.

He made an odd variation in "Polly Dawson," and introduced:

"So much the worse—they are not on the road to the boat."

"Shall I go and get them?" called I, forgetting to sing in my eagerness.

"No, no—don't talk! Sing—don't try to get them yet. Keep on dancing, little by little we will approach the place where they lie.'

I began dancing madly toward the guns, but Fitzmaurice's warning voice stopped me.

"Take care, take care—not so quick! Follow me in a circle—widen it gradually."

But before we had taken many steps, the savages appeared to suspect our intention; their murmurs checked Fitzmaurice at once, so perfect was his control.

"Come back," he sang to a lively air, "the entertainment isn't over yet."

The mad hope which flashed into my mind, died out with the first failure. I felt my strength giving way—my limbs almost refused to bear me through the dance of death.

"Courage, courage!" sang Fitzmaurice, "you left a sweetheart over the water, think of her."

Those words helped to revive my flagging spirits. I started on anew; one more effort at least for her sake.

"Good," cried Fitzmaurice. "Dance; it's for the dear girl at home! And the queen—shout for the queen! And our country—dance for old England, we'll see her yet, my boy—ta, ta, rum tum tiddy."

At that instant there was a dull heavy report in the distance—the voice of an English gun—it was like a sudden promise of safety. We learned afterwards what it was. An officer, at a long distance from us, had fired at a megapodus tumulus, that strange bird which builds, out of earth and shells, a mound, sometimes twenty-five feet long and four or five in height, by way of a resting-place for its eggs. The noise alarmed the savages; they turned as if to fly up the cliffs.

"Now!" cried Fitzmaurice.

We sprang to our guns, seized them, and ran toward the boat as only men can run who run from death in its most horrible shape. Three or four javelins whizzed through the air over our heads, but neither of us were touched. We reached the boat, and as we darted in and pushed from shore, the band came dashing down the rocks, forgetting their recent fright in rage at the escape of their prey. I dropped the oar I held and snatched my gun.

"Don't fire," said Fitzmaurice, still able to think of everything, to take in every view of the case. "One shot might be the commencement of hostilities that would prove fatal to the interests of the expedition."

I felt the wisdom of his suggestion; took up my oar again, and we rowed down the bay in silence, forgetting our fatigues, toiling so well that the light boat shot over the waters with the speed of a meteor. We gained the ship in safety, and recounted our adventure, which to this day I cannot think of without a strange feeling about my heart, while the demoniac cries of our foes seem again to ring in my ears.

THE INFLUENCE OF MIND.

THE visible creation, great and glorious as it is, is yet bound by the sovereign will of its Maker, by the mind of man. Not the bright system of rolling planets, not all the pageantry of the seasons, speak infinite power so loudly, as the immortal mind which thinks, reflects, and renders for them all-fitting adoration.

In the present state of society, especially in a country like this, where free institutions open wide paths to its development—mental excellence has a noble sphere in which to exert itself; yet, on the other hand, where society mingles freely and wealth is esteemed a fitting passport to its favor, there is continual danger that outward show and vain pretence may rob real merit of its just claims. Where fortunes are made in a day, and accomplishments almost mechanically acquired, much may pass for the sterling that is counterfeit; and hence, in almost every large company, it is impossible to know whether those who assume the lead, are the truly elevated or such as have enjoyed merely the sunshine of the world's favor. Yet while wealth and position have, and ever will have, their partizans in a world like ours, there are those who only value the gifts of mind. A cultivated intellect exerts a powerful influence, unknown to its possessor. It penetrates through all disguises and meets the live heart of its fellows. Its high thoughts illuminate its moral world; bringing new and beautiful creations from the chaos of other minds. It is the living, beating pulse of the universe, the brightest jewel in the crown of man's immortality. Vain are the attractions of the fairest form, if it is found to be deprived of the priceless ornament of a cultivated understanding. However our friends affect us when present, when absent the impress of their mind masks all their influence, and guides, directs and advises with a mighty moral power.

Perhaps there is no one that has not felt, in the presence of some persons, a chill and restraint, which, in vain they have endeavored to throw off; yet have been compelled to acknowledge the power of a superior or at least an unsympathizing mind. Beauty, form, outward things may draw the attention; but it is the intellect and affections that alone have power to hold the heart. In a short time, the influence of the outward ceases, and then truly begins the reign of this mental sceptre. We love or esteem the heart for what it is, not for what it has. To each other, as in the universe, we stand as individuals—our possessions are alone those of the soul. If this is adorned with loving affections, rich in noble thoughts, endowed with lofty principles, then the heart yields homage to this soul-wealth; but if through golden trapping we discover a poverty of soul—a little mind—we pity the millionaire, and admit not such into the sacred arena of confidence.

A popular mistake concerning mental culture is this—that if the boy is sent to school, if books and masters are afforded in profusion, then, as a matter of course he will become a thinker, an intellectual being. Not so. He may be regularly put through the drill of knowledge and leave school a very fool—a mere cipher in the world of mind. It is not study, but thought. Not mere effort, but intelligent effort, the right use of the talent, of a gift, the highest heaven could bestow, that swells the giant intellect. Books and other opportunities may be powerful aids, but it is the work of cultivating the mind which renders it that mighty, master thing which has struck the world with awe in the lives of a Galileo or a Newton!—American Miscellany.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House the sensational melodramatic drama of Waiting for the Verdict has proved one of the best pieces to draw produced at this house for some time. Mr. Pauncefort's impersonation of the afflicted old father, "Jonathan Roseblade," was a very careful and good piece of acting. Mr. Charles Thorne, as "Jaspar Roseblade," the victim to circumstantial evidence, displayed great power, and was fully equal to the rendition of the character. Mrs. Sophie Edwin, as the wife of the wrongfully accused man, brought out all the deep pathos of the character. Mr. Aldrich, as the villain of the piece, was of course, all that could be desired. Mr. Barry and Mrs. Saunders, in the low comedy parts of "Blinkey Brown" and "Sarah Sawyer" kept the audience laughing immoderately during the intervals in the plot where tears were not called for, and the rest of the characters were well sustained by the other members of the company. Waiting for the Verdict will be performed both this afternoon and evening. Next week the business at this theatre will go to the dogs, but by this I do not intend to convey the idea that it will be a bad business; on the contrary I anticipate that Professor Siegrist's wonderful trained dogs will become highly popular. These dogs cannot speak, but with that slight exception are equal in talent to many bipeds who strut the stage. The Siegrist family, consisting of the Professor and his children, Mlle. Rosa and Master August, appear in pantomime and gymnastic feats, and a numerous troupe of wonderful dogs in a most astounding round of performances.

The Eureka has been doing a moderately good business during the week. Columbus el Filibustero afforded an opportunity for the display of Mr. Wheatleigh's wonderful versatility, and his impersonation of the chief character called forth much applause. Mr. Stephen Leach and Mrs. Judah, as "Ferdinand" and "Isabella," were very good. Miss Clarkson made a beautiful "Columbia." The closing tableau is one of the most charming effects I have seen on the California stage, and in a great measure makes up for some shortcomings which were visible in the actors. The comedy of Like and Unlike, which was played with Columbus during the week, is a neat and sprightly piece. Especial credit is due Mrs. Fanny Morgan Phelps for her acting in the protean part of "Lisette." The Pas Styrien, in the second act, is an immense feature, and the Terpsichorean skill evinced by Mr. Wheatleigh and Miss Yeamans, in its execution, brought forth storms of applause. These two pieces will form the bill for this afternoon and evening. On Monday the military sensational drama of Jessie Brown, or the Siege of Lucknow. A more admirable impersonatrix (Call please copy,) of the character of "Jessie Brown," the Scotch lassie, than Mrs. Phelps, it would be hard too find on the American stage. Those who witness her performance of this beautiful character on Monday night will, I am sure, be ready to indorse this assertion. Mr. Wheatleigh is determined, however exigeant the public may be as regards novelties, to keep pace with their desires. In the course of next week he will produce Shakespeare's comedy or Twelfth Night, or What You Will. This play has not been performed in this city since the year 1856, when it was produced at the American Theatre by Mr. Wheatleigh and Laura Keene, and proved an immense success. Other novelties are in preparation. A new burlesque, founded on one of the topics of the day, is being written for this house, and in a short time Bourcicault's great drama of Arrah na Pogue will be received from London, and produced forthwith. Mr. Wheatleigh is meeting with most encouraging success in his enterprise, and works hard to deserve it.

I hear that Mr. Marsh, well known to the public of California as the originator of the Marsh troupe of juvenile comedians, has been left a fortune of $200,000. He is at present unaware of this fact, being on his way to this port from China.

TOUCHSTONE.

FIRES.—On Saturday night last, a large two story building, occupied as a junk store by Charles Hirley, was burned with its contents. Loss nearly $5,000. .. On Monday night, a fire broke out in the Pacific warehouse on the corner of Battery and Broadway, which destroyed an immense ammount of property. The building occupied a full fifty-vara lot, and was filled with valuable merchandise, among which was a large quantity of coal oil in cans. These bursting with the heat, saturated the goods and thus added an element to the fire, which all the efforts of the fire department were unable to quench, until most of the perishable articles were consumed. Up to yesterday, piles of merchandise were yet smouldering and burning in that part of the building where the coal oil was stored, notwithstanding that several hydrant streams have been steadily playing upon them, both night and day since the fire broke out. The loss of property will amount to nearly $500,000, of which some $300,000 was insured.

ACT I.

Scene I.—A Moonlit Glen in the Neighborhood.

High rocks right and left of Stage, with a ravine somewhere, and a waterfall somewhere else. A tree half dropping over a very high rock, as if it had been cut down by some one the day before yesterday. Moon, in the distance, shining. Storm heard without. Lightning without. Rain, hail and thunder, all without. Cold without. Rebels gradually appear from behind rocks. Music. Rebels come cautiously forward. They are about to speak,‡ when Sweeny-na-Cowl appears on the overhanging tree.

Sweeny [sliding down over the knotty points of the bark, and arriving safely on the ground.] Whisht, boys! Is it grammachreeing ye are, whin the ould fox is slapin' wid one eye opin, will yez? Be aisy, thin, Mick, and lets hear what the young Masther would say to yez? Oh, wirrah na poshleen, but it's the cess o' my heart that makes me talk this away.

Rebels [unanimously.] At all, at all?‖

[At this moment, the Military, led by the Lord Lieutenant, are seen on the top of the opposite rocks. The Lord-Lieutenant reviews them with the aid of a Sergeant, who tells him the words of command. They then draw up in line.

Lord Lieutenant [reading proclamation.] In the name of our Sovereign Lord, King George, I declare everybody a Rebel, all to-the-contrary-Acts notwithstanding: and hereby offer a reward for the apprehension of the notorious [is unable to spell the name] S-i-no [tries again, with spectacles] W-j——No. [Gives it up.] [To troops.] Fire!

[Soldiers look at one another, fix bayonets, Rebels wave shillalahs, dubiously, as curtain descends.

Well, sir, then Rilley the Roguey-Poguey conceals Sweeny-ma-Cowl in a water-cave, where Wurra-Wurra discovers him while bathing, and denounces him just as he comes up, out of breath, after his first header. Upon this Barny, who has been watching the whole scene from an otter's nest, fires at Wurra, who, however, manages to escape with the loss of the reuts that belong to Sweeny's confiscated estates. We then come to the Third Act, which bristles with sparkling repartee, specially in the scene where Barny makes love to Nelly-no-Moore.

ACT III.

Scene 1.—The old Caubeen.§

Enter Barny, dressed in a long whitey-brown coat with a cape to it, a red waistcoat, a blue tie, white hat, corduroy thingummies, blueish grayish stockings and low shoes, a pipe in his hat, and a stick in his hand.

Barney [singing.] Och! dhoolish astbore
Ye're ma gra!

[Repeats the above, winking cunningly at the audience.

Enter Nelly-no-Moore from Cottage.

Barney. Och! it's yerself as put the comether on the heart of a poor boy [meaning himself.]

Nelly. Be aisy, now, will yez? Sure yer galloping like Brian O'Linn's gossoon that couldn't ate anything but betwixt times.

Barny. Arrah mavorneen! an' who wouldn't whin he sees the dhoodeen a barning in every wink o' yer purty face?

Nelly [laughing.] Ah, Barny, na coolish achree! it's the bad dhrop that's in ye.

Barny [slyly] Sorra one o' me.

Nelly. Ah! git out wid ye. [Pushes him.]

Barney [in a whisper.] Will yez tread on the tail of my coat?

[She treads on the tail of his coat. Exit Barny thoughtfully, R. H.

And so on. Modesty prevents my remarking upon the sparkling character of these rapparees [I mean repartees.] My great Sensation Finale is in ACT IV.

Scene Last.—Ruined Tower by the Marg-a-grah. Wurra-Wurra watching the French coast through a telescope. Boroo-na-Cuclish is seated on the Flagstaff, waving his hat.

Boroo. By this and by that! The spalpeens!

Wurra. Oh, the gauger? Och, murther! I'm kilt entirely.

[Falls from a height of two thousand feet into the sea.]

[The Troops rush on the Peasantry, who are concealed in different parts of the Castle, or the Peasantry rush on the Troops; it doesn't matter much. Tableau. Gong.]

The Lord-Lieutenant [appearing in the centre, waving a danger signal.] I proclaim a general pardon for all the insurgents, and in particular Sweeny-na-Cowl. [Barny and Rilley the Roguey-Poguey kneel before him.] Bless you, my children! [Stepping forward.] And if our friends in front will but smile on our endeavors to please them, there will not be a more cheerful set of faces round the fire this night than the Lord Lieutenant.

[Insurgents and Military kneel on one another enthusiastically, and distant guns are heard, as curtain desends.]

* P. S. Sir, I put "or," so that "The Girl," etc., may serve for a title to those who are unable either to pronounce or understand the three Irish words above, as is, I own, the case with myself.

† Dramatis Personæ. The following "cast" is, of course, ideal. But it is my beau-ideal of what a cast should be. Imagine, sir, the dignity of Mr. Rogers as the "Lord Lieutenant," a true type of the Englishman. What more touching than the broken accents of Stella Colas in the pathetic parts; while Mr. Fetchter's mode of delivery has always sounded to my ears peculiarly Irish.

‡ These Rapparees don't speak, not because they have nothing to say, but because the parts would naturally be filled by "Supers," and a manager informed me that they were so "uncertain in dialogue, that I'd better come at once to my chief characters," and so I have. What the Rapparees would have said, what, in fact, they did say in my original manuscript, is now in the mouth of "Sweeny-na-Cowl."

§ Caubeen. Genuine Irish word. Often heard it.

SERVANTS.—When three or four ladies of the middle class meet together, and have a long, semi-confidential chat, whatever subjects they skim or dip into, the standing dish of their conversation is "servants." It is both safe and common ground. Women must be very intimate, or very silly, or both, to discuss "husbands." No doubt there is a tempting traitorous flavor about this topic which enables a wife to take a theoratical revenge for offences, small or otherwise; but still, however slighted she may be, a wise woman feels that it is a nice and delicate process, requiring infinite skill to chastise her other half effectually when her own share of the whole is alone present. He, the offending half, is comfortably reading the paper at his club, or writing at his office, or out in the fields; but wherever he may be, he is profoundly unconscious of the whipping which is laid on him at home, both while it is being administered, and after it is over. Neither she nor her confidante tells him a word about it, for one of the conditions of the revelation is silence. Thus, if a sensitive woman has been drawn into confidential complaints about her husband to another, the result is generally no relief, but an uncomfortable suspicion that she has bared herself to fresh pain. Depend upon it, suffering wives mostly hold their tongues. Then, again, it is impossible to get real sympathy in the troubles of marriage from unmarried women. Maids' husbands are perfect. The subject of children, moreover, is a restricted one. Doting mothers are indifferent to the praises of other babies, and complaints about children want the spice of treachery which gives a whet to those about husbands. The essence of most piquant confidence is evil. Your genuine tattler seldom cares to speak or hear good about any one. Even harmless chat is generally languid except some person be discussed and blamed. There must be some subject in which all are interested, and about which all can complain. True, maids and childless wives can sit in judgment on their neighbors and acquaintances, but there is need of much caution in this indulgence, for friends are sometimes defended behind their backs, and slanderers are occasionally stung themselves. But "servants" are safe and common ground. Your conversation is both personal and querulous, and yet there is no accompanying sense of humiliation. You have not to bewail an inseparable tie; indeed, the consciousness of being able to dismiss the offender makes a sort of background of magnanimity to your sufferings. You seem to bear and forbear. When you say you do not think you can put up with Martha's carelessness or impudence any longer, you hint at the consideration and gentleness you have shown yourself. "Will you believe it? She actually," etc. "No, really? Well, I always," etc. In fact, there are no good old-fashioned servants left—the race has perished. Mind you, we are not now speaking in the person of one of the lady-interlocutors at a social palaver, but summing up their conclusions. The race of old-fashioned, faithful, devoted servants has perished.

HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATIONS.—These institutions have almost invariably proved profitable investments, and have been the means of procuring homes for many who would have otherwise expended the money thus invested in frivolous ways. The California Homestead Association has just been formed, and has negotiated for two blocks of land in the Western Addition, to be subdivided amongst its members in the usual way. The rate of subscription is to be $10 per month. The property lies within three blocks of the Turk street Railroad, has a perfect title, is on the grade, and is easily furnished with water. Those wishing to become members can apply for more explicit information to J. S. Luty, Secretary, at 305 Montgomery street.

MUSICAL GOSSIP.—The "Singing" Tone—That most beautiful and rare of all musical qualities of the Pinno Forte, sought for by every first-class pianist—the prolonged, or "SINGING TONE," has been carried to greater perfection in the Bradbury Piano than has heretofore been attained. Under the hands of a skillful player, the Piano is made to sing, so as to resemble a beautiful vocal song, with instrumental accompaniment. The most pleasing effects are thus produced. The pure, rich and sympathetic qualities of tone for which these Pianos have become so celebrated, render them favorites not only with the pianist, but with the vocalist also. We learn that Mr. Bradbury has just received three more First Premiums from State Fairs, making the tenth awarded him.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received n monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent. per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

KATE ROCKFORD, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant. You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and allowing Plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Kate Fossit, for costs of suit, and general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

THE FIFTH INDUSTRIAL FAIR
OF THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE
OF SAN FRANCISCO,
TO BE HELD IN THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE PAVILION,
IN AUGUST, 1865.

The MECHANICS' INSTITUTE having determined to hold their Fifth Industrial Fair during the coming season, the Executive Committee would respectfully invite all persons desirous of exhibiting Machines, Manufactures, Agricultural Implements, Horticultural Products, Minerals, Ores and Works of Art, to make application immediately, in order that the proper space may be allotted them.

The Exhibition will be opened on THURSDAY, the 10th day of August, at 10 o'clock A. M.

The general management of the Fair is entrusted to an Executive Committee, consisting of the officers of the Institute.

No contracts or agreements will be recognized, unless made by the authorized agents of this committee.

A competent person will be in attendance at the Pavilion to receive and register all goods designed for exhibition, and will receipt therefor.

Contributions of machinery and other articles that require long time to prepare for exhibition, will be received from the 15th of July to the 21 of August.

Articles for exhibition that require large space may be entered on or before the 20th day of July, and space will be allotted to the exhibitor on or before the 21 of August.

The Picture Galleries will be ready for the reception of Pictures, Embroidery, Wax and Fancy Work of all kinds on the 1st of August, when space will be allotted.

The committee will be prepared for the reception of Fruits, Flowers, Agricultural and Horticultural productions, and design to have the tables so arranged that the best display possible can be made in this department; and every effort will be made and care taken to preserve their freshness, so that exhibitors may receive full credit for their productions. Those wishing space on these tables should engage it at an early day. There will be space reserved for additions to this department during the Fair.

The several transportation companies, as on former occasions, have, with commanding liberality, consented to transport articles intended exclusively for exhibition, free of charge, and Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co., in like manner, will take charge of them.

The committee have the fullest confidence that the coming Fair will not only be the most complete and varied in its character, but will also be more attractive than any previous Exhibition of the kind on this coast.

No pains or expense will be spared to give the contributors satisfactory opportunities in the spacious Pavilion of the Institute for the display of their contributions, and to furnish whatever may be necessary to make the Fair an institution where those who frequent it may be pleased and instructed.

All articles forwarded should be labelled, "For the Industrial Fair," San Francisco.

All communications to be addressed to C. S. HIGGINS, Corresponding Secretary.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. THE CHANGELING.

A. D. 1691.

FOR the fairest maid in Hampton
They needed not to search,
Who saw young Anna Favor
Come walking into church,—

Or bringing from the meadows,
At set of harvest-day,
The frolic of the blackbirds,
The sweetness of the hay.

Now the weariest of all mothers,
The saddest two-years bride,
She scowls in the face of her husband,
And spurns her child aside.

"Rake out the red coals, goodman,—
For there the child shall lie,
Till the black witch comes to fetch her,
And both up chimney fly.

"It 's never my own little daughter,
It 's never my own she said;
"The witches have stolen my Anna,
And left me an imp instead.

"Oh, fair and sweet was my baby,
Blue eyes and hair of gold;
But this is ugly and wrinkled,
Cross, and cunning, and old.

"I hate the touch of her fingers,
I hate the feel of her skin;
It 's not the milk from my bosom,
But my blood, that she sucks in.

"My face grows sharp with the torment;
Look! my arms are skin and bone!
Rake open the red coals, goodman,
And the witch shall have her own.

"She 'll come when she hears it crying,
In the shape of an owl or bat,
And she 'll bring us our darling Anna
In place of her screeching brat."

Then the goodman, Ezra Dalton,
Laid his hand upon her head:
"Thy sorrow is great, O woman!
I sorrow with thee," he said.

"The paths to trouble are many,
And never but one sure way
Leads out to the light beyond it:
My poor wife, let us pray."

Then he said to the great All-Father,
"Thy daughter is weak and blind;
Let her sight come back, and clothe her
Once more in her right mind.

"Lead her out of this evil shadow,
Out of these fancies wild;
Let the holy love of the mother
Turn again to her child.

"Make her lips like the lips of Mary
Kissing her blessed Son;
Let her hands, like the hands of Jesus,
Rest on her little one.

"Comfort the soul of thy handmaid,
Open her prison-door,
And thine shall be all the glory
And praise forevermore."

Then into the face of its mother
The baby looked up and smiled;
And the cloud of her soul was lifted,
And she knew her little child.

A beam of the slant west sunshine
Made the wan face almost fair,
Lit the blue eyes' patient wonder,
And the rings of pale gold hair.

She kissed it on lip and forehead,
She kissed it on cheek and chin
And she bared her snow-white bosom
To the lips so pale and thin.

Oh, fair on her bridal morning
Was the maid who blushed and smiled,
But fairer to Ezra Dalton
Looked the mother of his child.

With more than a lover's fondness
He stooped to her worn young face,
And the nursing child and the mother
He folded in one embrace.

"Blessed be God!" he murmured.
"Blessed be God!" she said;
"For I see, who once was blinded,—
I live, who once was dead.

"Now mount and ride, my goodman,
As thou lovest thy own soul!
Woe 's me, if my wicked fancies
Be the death of Goody Cole!"

His horse he saddled and bridled,
And into the night rode he,—
Now through the great black woodland,
Now by the white-beached sea.

He rode through the silent clearings,
He came to the ferry wide,
And thrice he called to the boatman
Asleep on the other side.

He set his horse to the river,
He swam to Newbury town,
And he called up Justice Sewall
In his nightcap and his gown.

And the grave and worshipful justice
(Upon whose soul be peace!)
Set his name to the jailer's warrant
For Goodwife Cole's release.

Then through the night the hoof-beats
Went sounding like a flail;
And Goody Cole at cockcrow
Came forth from Ipswich jail.

UNLAWFUL CURES.

ONE can scarcely credit that at any period there could have existed men of science and genius who believed that there were supernatural means of curing disease, did we not, even to the present day, find imbeciles who verily dread the malpractices of the devil and his vicarious agents. Ancient writers divided their cures into awful and unlawful. The former were obtained from divine aid; the latter, from sorcerers, witches, magicians, wizards, and cunning men, who treated all maladies by spells, cabalastic words, charms, characters, images, amulets, ligatures, philtres, incantations, etc.; by which means, according to Cardan, Artesius, Picatrix, and sundry wise men, the aforesaid sorcerers and witches could prevent fire from burning, find out thieves and stolen goods, show absent faces in a glass, make serpents lie still, staunch blood, cure gout, biting of mad dogs, toothache, et omnia mundi malo. "Many doubt," says Nicholas Taurellus, "whether the devil can cure such diseases he hath not made, and some flatly deny it; however, common experience confirms, to our astonishment, that magicians can work such feats, and that the devil, without impediment, can penetrate through all the parts of our body, and cures such maladies by means to us unknown." Some of these means were rather singular; and learned divines, moreover inform us that to resist exorcisms these wretches and magicians had St. Catherine's wheel imprinted on the roof of their mouths, or on some other part. Taurellus asserts, that to doubt it is to run into a sceptical extreme of incredulity. Godelman affirms that Satan is an excellent physician; Langius maintains that Jupiter Meneerates was a magician: and Marcellus Donatus pays the same compliment to Solomon, who, he says, "cured all the diseases of the mind by spells and charms, and drove away devils, and that Elezar did the same before Vespasian."

This fact being clearly ascertained, the next question was whether it was lawful in a desperate case to crave the help of the evil one. Paracelsus rather impiously argues that we might, as it matters not, he says, "whether it be God or the devil, angels or unclean spirits, (immundi spiritus,) that cure him, so that he be eased. If a man fall in a ditch, what matter is it whether a friend or an enemy help him out? If I be troubled with such a malady, what care I whether the devil himself, or any of his ministers, by God's permission, redeem me?" and therefore concludes, that diseases brought on by malefices can only be cured by incantations. However, this doctrine was denounced as abominable by Remigius, Bodinus, Godelmannus, Erastus, and various divines and schoolmen. Therefore pontifical writers and sages recommend adjuration and exorcism by "fire, suffumigations, lights, cutting the air with swords, (gladiorum ictus,) sacred herbs, odors," etc., though some hungry devils can only be cast out by fasting.

Witches and imposters, says Lord Bacon, have always held a competition with physicians. Galen complains of this superstition, and observes that patients placed more confidence in the oracles of Esculapius and their own idle dreams than in the prescriptions of doctors. The introduction of precious stones into medical practice owed its origin to a superstitious belief that, from their beauty, splendor, and high value, they were the natural receptacles for good spirits. Mystery, in the dark ages, and, alas! even now, increases the confidence in remedial means; reveal their true nature, the charm is dissolved. One cannot but wonder when we behold men pre-eminent in deep learning and acute observation becoming converts to such superstitious practices. Lord Bacon believed in spells and amulets; Sir Theodore Mayence, who was physician to three English sovereigns, and supposed to have been Shakspeare's Dr. Caius, believed in supernatural agency, and frequently prescribed the most disgusting and absurd medicines, such as the heart of a mule ripped up alive, a portion of the lungs of a man who had died a violent death, or the hand of a thief who had been jibbeted on some particular day. Nauseous medicines have ever been deemed the most efficacious, on the reasoning that as everything medical is nauseous, everything that is nauseous must be medical. The ancients firmly believed that blood could be staunched by charms; the bleeding of Ulysses was stopped by that means; and Cato the Censor has given us an incantation for setting dislocated bones. To this day charms are supposed to arrest the flow of blood:

"Tom Pots was but a serving man,
But yet he was a doctor good,
He wound his kerchief on the wound,
And with some kind words he staunch'd the blood."

Sir Walter Scott says, in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel:"

"She drew the splinter from the wound,
And with a charm she stanched the blood."

The strength of imagination in effecting wonderful cures has been observed in all ages; and Avicenna declares, "that he prefers confidence before art, precepts, and all remedies whatsoever." Our learned Burton says, "that this strong imagination or conceit is Astrum Hominus, and the rudder of this our ship, which reason should steer, but, overborne by phantasie, cannot manage, and so suffers itself and the whole vessel of ours to be overruled and often overturned."

Nothing could be more absurd than the notions regarding some of these supposed cures: A ring made from the hinge of a coffin had the power of relieving cramps; which were also mitigated by having a rusty old sword hung up by the bedside. Nails driven in an oak tree prevented the tooth-ache. A halter that had served in hanging a criminal was an infallible remedy for the headache, when tied round the head; this affection was equally cured by the moss growing on a human skull, dried and pulverized, and taken as a cephalic snuff. A dead man's hand could dispel tumors of the glands by stroking the parts nine times, but the hand of a man who had been cut down from the gallows was the most efficacious. To cure warts one had nothing to do but to steal a piece of beef from the butcher, with which the warts were to be rubbed; then enter it in any filth, and as it rotted, the warts would wither and fall.

The chips of a gallows on which several persons had been hanged, when worn in a bag around the neck, would cure the ague. A stone with a hole in it, suspended at the head of the bed, would effectually stop the night-mare; hence it was called a hag-stone, as it prevented troublesome witches from sitting upon the sleeper's stomach. The same amulet tied to the key of a stable-door, deterred witches from riding horses over the country.

Rickety children were cured by being drawn through a cleft tree, which was afterward bound up; as the split wood united, the child acquired strength. Creeping through a perforated stone to cure various disorders was a Druidical rite, still practiced in the East. In the Parish of Marden there is a stone with a hole in it, fourteen inches in diameter, through which children are drawn for the rickets; and, in the North, infants are made to pass through a hole cut in a cheese the day of their christening.

"CUT OUT."—It is many years since I fell in love with Jerusha Skreggs, the handsomest gal by far that ever went on legs. By meadow, creek and wood and dell often did we walk, and the moonlight smiled on our meeting lips, and night winds learned our talk. Jerusha Jane was all to me, my heart was young and true, and loved with a double and twisted love, and a love that was honest, too. I roamed all over the neighbors' farms, and robbed the widowed bowers, and tore my trousers and scratched my hands in search of choicest flowers. In my boyish love I brought all of these to my Jerusha Jane; but I wouldn't be so foolish now if I were a boy again. A city chap then came along, all dressed up in store clothes, with a shiny hat, a shiny vest, and a moustache under his nose. He talked to her of singing schools, (for her father owned a farm,) and she left me, the country love, and took the new chap's arm. And all that night I never slept, nor could I eat next day, for I loved that girl with a fervent love that naught could drive away. I strove to win her back to me, but it was all in vain; the city chap, with hairy lip, married Jerusha Jane. And my heart was sick and sore, until the thought struck me, that just as good fish remained as e'er were caught in the sea. So I went to the Methodist church one night, and saw a dark brown curl peeping from under a gipsy hat, and I married that very girl. And many years have past and gone, and I think my loss my gain; and I often bless that fancy chap who stole Jerusha Jane.

A SELL.—A charming French actress, embarking with a rich monsieur from France, dropped a small box overboard, as if by accident, whereupon she cried out in despair, "The diamonds of my child! Lost! lost! mon Dieu! mon Dieu!" She was consoled as well as possible at the time by her wealthy admirer making her a costly present. Subsequently the box was fished up, and, for a considerable reward, transferred to him. What was his astonishment on finding it contained only dominoes!

THE MAGNET OUTDONE.—A lecturer was dilating upon the power of the magnet, defying any one to show or name anything surpassing it. A hearer accepted the challenge, and instanced a young lady who used to attract him thirteen miles every Sunday.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

RARE CHANCE

TO SECURE

DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 60 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

J. S. LUTY, Secretary, 305 Montgomery street,

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.
GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent. per day on a $50 note.
Two cents	"	$100	"
Ten	"	$500	"
20	"	$1,000	"
$1	"	$5,000	"

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE accomplished editor of the Dramatic Chronicle says he should like to know if we think "writers are liberally paid in California." We must confess that we have a suspicion that they are not; but the fact of the matter is, the proprietor of the Mercury was trying to "bear" literary stock, so we did a little "bulling." We imagine literary labor is even cheaper in the interior of the State, than it is in San Francisco. In the Quincy Union of July 22d, we observed an article headed "The Editorship," in which the proprietor of that paper expresses his regret that "circumstances were such as to cause its editor to withdraw." He then goes on to say:

"Mr. Buckbee has been the editor of this paper ever since it started, and, during the time, he has never to our knowledge, asked for or received any pecuniary recompense for his services. That he has filled the position with ability and credit to himself, our readers well know."

We are quite sure that our neighbor of the Dramatic Chronicle who writes for cash instead of credit, will agree with us that Mr. Buckbee in working for nothing for three years, far from doing a virtuous action, was guilty of a great blunder, and that the proprietor served him just right in not allowing him, after he had been turning the grindstone so long for his accommodation, to grind a little axe of his own. The proprietor of the Union winds up his article thus:

"We have not, as yet, engaged the services of any person to edit the Union, and until we do so, our readers will have to be satisfied with such melange as we shall choose to publish, or else—not read the paper."

We do not suppose that the proprietor of the Quincy Union, after having been accustomed for three years to an editor who "never to his knowledge asked for, or received any recompense for his services," will be inclined to indulge in the extravagance of a paid editor; he will rather look around for some ambitious young man to whom the glory of being "an editor" will be sufficient payment for the performance of duties, which, when properly executed, involve a considerable amount of hard labor. After having been an editor for a year or two, the young man will be entirely spoilt for manual labor, in which it is possible he might have attained excellence, and will be only too happy if, having by hard toil attained the art of stringing other men's ideas together in the form of "leaders," he can at length obtain remuneration for these ingenious pieces of literary mosaic work at the rate of a postage stamp per line. No, Mr. Editor of the Chronicle, we do not "think writers are liberally paid in California." Our craft is in danger. These cheap scribblers, are they who howl at "carping critics," they hand together in a conspiracy to pass off their base metal on the public. These are they, who, having after hours, nay, days of patient labor, produced a sickly distempered mouse, gnash their teeth with fury when they see the little beast safely caged behind the wires of the "mouse-trap."

THE advisability of being a "Short Hair" was proved by the issue of the fight between the "Long Hairs" and the "Short Hairs" in Sacramento last week. The "Long Hairs" were whipped, as when they attempted to grab the "Short Hairs," they could get nothing to lay hold of. Moral. When you attend a Sacramento Convention, always adopt the "Short Hair" fashion.

IT is interesting to know that the terrible organization known as the "Golden Circle" has suspended all action until the 1st of July, 1870. Until that date the knights will be under a cloud, but when that milleunial period arrives the knights will see daylight. If newspapers are to be believed, the Golden Circle has cut quite a figure in the late rebellion; now the Golden Circle is 0.

IN the Examiner of Monday last, a communication appeared which fills our minds with the gravest apprehensions. The correspondent who signs himself "Anti-Nig," states that on Sunday "intelligent-looking white girls of about nine years of age, were seen affectionately embracing and kissing the cast iron negro boys, stationed in front of the Russ House block on Montgomery street." "Anti Nig" goes on to say:

"What wonder that children, having the "equality of the negro" daily instilled into their minds, should illustrate the effect of such teachings, by embracing these representations of young American citizens of African descent!"

What wonder, indeed! No doubt the storekeeper before whose door these cast iron negroes are placed, is an Abolitionist, and put them there in order to tempt intelligent-looking white girls of about nine years of age to kiss them. These are dreadful times we live in. Only a few days ago, we saw an intelligent looking white baby fondling a black doll. That child when she grows up, will marry a negro! There can be no doubt of it. And who will be to blame? Assuredly, her parents who bought her that black doll will only have themselves to thank. Let those cast-iron negroes be removed from Russ House block, lest an outraged people rise in their might and destroy them, before another intelligent-looking white girl of nine years of age embraces them. Let all the black dolls found in the toy shops be confiscated before this thing goes too far. It is true that down South intelligent white children have been in the habit of kissing negroes who were not cast iron, but they were slaves and therefore not to be regarded with the disgust and abhorrence that the cast iron figures of little free black boys—no doubt the Abolitionist who cast them meant them for free black boys—must inspire in the mind of every well educated girl of nine years of age. We would recommend as one means of checking the alarming growth of this feeling in favor of the negro in the infantile mind, that mothers should always threaten their children, when naughty, that they will "give them to the black man," then let stories be written about little girls who kissed black men and were afterwards eaten by them; let the present edition of children's books be destroyed, and, in the new edition, let all the cruel giants be represented as negroes. We merely throw out these suggestions, as it is evident, when white babies hug negro dolls, and intelligent-looking white girls of nine years of age embrace cast iron negro boys with blue jackets on, it is time that something should be done.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, in responding to the toast of "The Navy," at a banquet given on the 10th of June at Fishmongers Hall, London, said the Emperor of the French had invited the English armor-plated fleet to make a tour round the coast of France, and in return the French iron-plated fleet had been asked to make a similar tour around the English coast. Isn't that a nice little arrangement? Louis Napoleon wants to have a look at John Bull's iron-plated vessels, to count them and see who has got most. Wouldn't it be a good plan for Uncle Sam to write a little note to Louis, asking him if he wouldn't like to have a look at his little fleet? The result of these two naval reviews will be that the Government which finds itself the weakest in that arm of the service will immediately set to work to supply the deficiency. The entente cordiale is very cordial between England and France, but they like to keep even in the matter of iron-plated vessels, in case of accidents. Uncle Sam ought really, now he has got through his fighting, to do a little reviewing. A grand naval review off the coast of Mexico to do honor to Emperor Maximilian might have a good effect. These little courtesies passing between nations are very pleasant.

WHAT queer people they have in Paris! A letter from that city says: "We have just had our dog show, and we are to have our insect show." We suppose the insects did not show on the dogs, but they were doubtless there, though not at that time reckoned among the Paris sights. Parasites are to be included in this display of insects. Class No. 4 is "Insects used for the table." We wonder if that is a numerous class in Paris. In America we might find at a dinner party big bugs and a fine specimen of grub. We have heard of the Diet of Worms, but didn't know they were fond of it in Paris. "Insects used for the table!" This is turning the tables, when human beings become insectiverous, and instead of being eaten by insects, eat them. Stewed mosquitoes would be a delicate dish for the Summer time. Fricaseed fireflies might be called light diet. Perhaps wasps are made into a sauce piquante. We cannot believe class 4 is large; John the Baptist used to eat locusts, and the Digger Indians eat grasshoppers; but they don't use tables, and we don't suppose St. John did either. We have seen a roach used for the table, but it was not a cockroach. We know snails are made into soup, but of course every one knows a snail is not an insect; on the contrary, it is an air-breathing gasteropod mollusk of the genus Helix. We give it up; we can't imagine what insects are used for the table.

A MAN in China, who robbed a peddlar, was put into a mortar and fired against a wall. This may be called a brick and mortar punishment.

"THE resident correspondent of the Alta California" in New York, writes letters which are admirably suited to the columns of that paper. The proprietors of the Alta have a wholesome fear of putting a piece of new cloth into an old garment, and select their writers accordingly. How like Sir Andrew Aguecheek is the Alta, the comic paper of the Pacific Coast! Let little Puck fool ever so admirably the Alta can say:

"Ay, he does well enough, if he be disposed, and so do I too; he does it with a better grace, but I do it more natural."

The New York correspondent must have graduated in the office on Sacramento street, must have been a localitems at one time and written funny Police Court items, like the present incumbent, or he could never have learnt to adapt himself to the style of the Alta so admirably. How infinitely funny is the following:

"'Take off your hat, sir!' was the pleasant salutation to a gent last Sabbath evening, in old Trinity Church, by one of the tallow-faced understrappers there employed to sweep out, etc. The gent spoken to was escorting a couple of Boston ladies in viewing the chancel and edifice after the vesper service, and, Yankee as he is, thoughtlessly placed it on his head, without any idea of disrespect to the time or place. However, he learned something just then."

Severe man! The "understrapper" was "tallow-faced" because he told the Alta's New York correspondent—for he certainly was the "gent"—to take off his hat in the House of God. It is comforting to know "he learned something just then;" we hope he will remember it. It is fit that a "gent" should be employed as New York correspondent; there is a strong flavor of "gent" pervading this correspondence which is admirably in keeping with the general character of the Alta's columns. Here is another highly interesting paragraph:

"The common ejaculation to-day is, 'Oh, my!—how hot it is!' People are endeavoring in all manner of ways to make themselves comfortable, and he or she who attains the nearest to nudity consistent with decency, are looked upon admiringly."

Who does not recognize Alta English in the expression "he or she are looked upon admiringly?" What a wonderful piece of work is the Alta California! All the parts—editor, localitems, correspondents—combine to make a stupendous whole.

IN a list of passengers by stage, arrived at Virginia City, appears "A. Snob." If it is ever worth a man's while to go to the trouble and expense of having his name changed by Act of Legislature, we should think it would be so in the case of this unfortunate individual. What woman can he find possessed of sufficient strength of mind to marry him and proceed to raise a lot of little Snobs. Horrible! "A. Snob" may not be a snob; it may be one of those cases where the sins of the father are visited on the children to the third and fourth generation. Perhaps his great grandfather justly gained the name of "Snob;" but are his descendants forever to bear that odious appellation? Forbid it, Justice! How that name must check all the great aspirations of the man who bears it. It is the boast of Americans that there is a possibility of any one of them becoming President of the United States. Yes, except "A. Snob." Who would vote for a "A. Snob" for President? Let him change his name; better call himself "Villain" than "Snob" We did not know, we could not believe, before we read that passenger list, that there was, "crawling twixt earth and Heaven," a being so unfortunate as to bear as his patronymic that word which is used to designate the very lowest of God's creatures—"snob."

IT is thought that quite an influx of population into Mexico will shortly take place. The United States Government is paying off some thousands of soldiers quite close to the borders of Mexico, and it is probable that a considerable number of these will cross over to have a look at the country. If the Government imagined for an instant that these soldiers would be likely to interfere in Mexican affairs by taking up arms on the Liberal side they would of course take care not to discharge them anywhere in the neighborhood of Maximilian's domains, but they know the soldiers are to be trusted not to commit any breaches of neutrality. Strict neutrality will be preserved; if soldiers will "straggle" into Mexico, the United States can't help it.

IN a list of new books, we observe: "The Printer's Handbook; being a Treatise on the Imposition of Type." Good gracious! If all the impositions practiced by means of type are enumerated in this work, it might be issued in some hundreds of volumes, and be interesting not only to printers but the world at large; but perhaps, after all, it only refers to the imposing or placing of type in the form in which it is to be printed, in pages. The war news as published in the newspapers during the continuance of the rebellion, would, if collected into a volume, make a very pretty specimen of the "imposition of type."

THE Nevada Gazette makes the extraordinary assertion that "The Alta has found a man who breeds gold fish by artificial incubation." We were not aware that the spawn of fish underwent the process of incubation. The spectacle of a gold fish sitting on its eggs to hatch them would be an interesting one. Perhaps the editor of the Alta intends to turn his attention to the "incubation" of gold fish, and give up his fruitless attempt to hatch an idea, on which he has been so long engaged.

TREM

CONCLUSION OF MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NOVEL,

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XL—Continued.

HARCOURT LOWTHER had his gallop in the Park. It was dusk before he went back to town, and he left the Park by the Prince's Gate, and rode slowly through the gorgeous dismality of Stuccoville. He walked his horse down the street in which Francis Tredethlyn's household had been established.

Looking up at the dimly-lighted windows, Harcourt Lowther wondered if Maude Tredethlyn's heart, set free all at once from its mercenary bondage, had fluttered back to the lover of her youth.

"She loved me once," he thought, "and my hold upon her ought to be stronger now than ever it was."

Riding slowly homeward Mr. Lowther found it very difficult to shut out of his mind the picture of a burning ship, and the image of the man whom he had called his friend, prominent amidst a wild night-scene of death and horror.

"I'm glad I had nothing to do with the fellow's going in that vessel," thought Mr. Lowther. "I had no hand in his mad freak of bolting off to Buenos Ayres; so I needn't worry myself. If he had lived to get there safely, I daresay he'd have been finished off by fever."

Nearly a week elapsed before Harcourt Lowther approached the woman who had once been his plighted wife. The schemer wanted to be sure of his triumph. One interview with Maude, one look in her face, would be enough to tell him whether his hold on her was undiminished. A nervous restlessness that was foreign to his temperament had come upon him since the tidings of the Kingfisher's destruction had reached his ears; and he could not endure anything like uncertainty or suspense.

He called at Stuccoville one morning. He was told that Mrs. Tredethlyn would see no one; but that Miss Desmond would receive him, if he pleased.

He did please; and was ushered to where Julia sat writing at a little table near the window. There was a door opening from Mrs. Tredethlyn's dressing-room into the morning-room; and as Harcourt entered at one door, a pale wan creature in black appeared at the other.

She was drawing back, when he ran to her and seized her hand.

"Maude!" he cried, passionately, "I must speak to you. Surely you are not going to treat me like a stranger."

She tried to take her hand from his, but he held it firmly and drew her into the room; as he did so, Julia, who had risen on his entrance, went quietly out at the other door. Maude and Harcourt were alone.

"What can you have to say to me?" asked Mrs. Tredethlyn. "It is cruel of you to force yourself upon me at such a time as this. I have grief enough and trouble enough without being tortured by the sight of you."

Harcourt Lowther looked at her aghast.

"Tortured by the sight of me!" he repeated.

"Yes," answered Maude indignantly. "It was your fault that my husband left me. It was you who planted base suspicions in my mind when there was no need for suspicion. Why did you poison my mind against the best husband a woman ever had? How could you be so base as to repay his trusting friendship with such malicious treachery?"

"Because I loved you, Mrs. Tredethlyn, and believed that your husband had wronged you. Was I likely to be a very lenient judge of his conduct towards you, when I had loved you so passionately, and had been jilted by you so cruelly for him? You questioned me, and I spoke. Can you forget or deny that I spoke reluctantly? You hang your head, Mrs. Tredethlyn; ah, I see that you remember."

"Yes," answered Maude piteously, as she sank into a chair; "you are right. I made you speak. It was my own jealous folly from first to last. If others doubted and suspected, I ought to have trusted him. What a pitiful return I made him for so much devotion, when I could not even give him my confidence!" She was lost in thought. It was of her husband that she was thinking. Harcourt Lowther could see that.

She looked at him presently. "Have you anything more to say to me?" she asked coldly.

"Have I anything more to say! Are you mad, Mrs. Tredethlyn, that you ask me such a question? I respect your natural sorrow for the terrible fate of your husband; but I should despise you if you were so false-hearted a prude as to affect forgetfulness of what is due to me."

Maude looked at him as she had never looked at him before. Wonder, indignation, disgust—all mingled in the expression of her countenance. He had woven his network to ensnare a frivolous shallow-hearted girl, and behold, on the completion of the schemer's web, a woman arose in the strength of her truth and purity, and shook herself free from the toils as easily as if they had been so much gossamer. "There is something due from me to you?" she asked haughtily. "What is it?"

"The fulfilment of your broken promise. I have waited, Maude, and waited patiently. Hopeless but patient, I have given you a disinterested devotion which is without a parallel in the history of man's sacrifice for the woman of his choice. Now that you are free, I ask some atonement for the past, some reward for my patience. Tell me that the past is not quite forgotten. Why do you look at me like that? Have I been the dupe of a coquette from first to last, Mrs. Tredethlyn, and does your husband's death only leave you free to jilt me again? Have I been fooled to the top of my bent by a woman who has never loved me?"

"No, Mr. Lowther," Maude answered, very quietly; "I did once love you. But my love died—a very sudden death."

"When you discovered the advantages of a wealthy marriage for the penniless daughter of a commercial defaulter," cried Harcourt.

"No; my love for you was a girlish fancy, if you like—though Heaven only knows how deeply I felt for you in your exile—how willing I would have been to resign my imaginary wealth for love of you, if you had asked me to do so. But you never did ask that. You did not want the wife without the fortune. When you came home and found me engaged to another man—about to sacrifice myself in a mercenary marriage, as you thought—there was yet time to have exacted the fulfilment of my promise. I loved you then, Harcourt. A word from you, and I would have told Francis the truth, and demanded my release. He was far too generous to have withheld it. But in doing that I should have offended my father, and I should have come to you penniless. You did not want me on those terms, Harcourt. The honest indignation of a disinterested lover never found an utterance on your lips. You were contented to assume the position of friend and confidant to your unconscious rival; and it is only since I have been left alone to think of my past life, that I have fully understood the dishonor involved in keeping our broken engagement a secret from my husband. I loved you when you came back to England, Harcourt. It was a hard battle which duty had to fight against the unaltered affection of my girlhood. I prayed to God night and day for strength to do my duty, and to keep my promise to the man who had a claim upon me, which you have never known. I prayed for power to blot your image from my mind; and my prayer was heard. My first foolish love died on my wedding-day, Harcourt, when you stood by to see me married to Francis. From that hour to this you have been no more to me than any other man who has paid me the conventional attentions which I imagined I had a right to receive. If I had ever seen more than this in your conduct, Mr. Lowther, you would have found me quite capable of asserting my position."

"The world has chosen to see a good deal more than conventional courtesy in my attendance upon you, Mrs. Tredethlyn," answered he. He had lost his game. Utterly defeated in the moment of his expected triumph, he was careless as to the rest of his play. "People have been good enough to make us the subject of considerable discussion, Mrs. Tredethlyn," continued Harcourt. "A man is apt to hear these things, though they rarely reach the ears of the lady most interested in hearing them. The people amongst whom we live have made up their minds about us, I know, and will be considerably astonished if you throw me over now that you are free to reward the patient devotion which has endured so much in the hope of this hour."

He saw Maude's look of unutterable scorn; a look which revealed her to him in a new and higher light, and inspired him with a more passionate love than he had ever felt for her yet—and at his worst he had loved her.

"Maude," he cried, in a sudden fit of mingled rage and despair, "why do you goad me to say these things? I know how detestible I seem to you. And yet, as there is a heaven above me, I have loved you truly from first to last. Pity me if, while I prayed for no better fate than to face the enemy's guns on an Indian battle-field, I was a coward in social life, and dared not brave genteel poverty even for your sake. Pity me if I shrank from thrusting myself between you and a wealthy marriage. I had been poor all my life and I know what you have never learnt—the horrors of a gentleman's poverty. You would have thought me a model of all that is noble and distinguished if I had exposed you to its miseries; you think me a scoundrel because I was not selfish enough to say to you, 'Reject Francis Tredethlyn and a life of elegant ease, and accept my devotion and an existence of penury and trouble.'"

"And you ask me now to fulfil my broken promise? Have you inherited a fortune, Mr. Lowther? or how is it that your ideas upon matrimony have altered?"

The schemer flushed crimson to the roots of his hair, and then grew deadly pale. For the life of him he could not answer that question. He could not say, "My position is unchanged, but you are rich. Give me your fortune and the heart I did not choose to claim when it was unaccompanied by fortune."

"Had we not better wish each other good morning, Mr. Lowther?" Maude said, after a little pause. "Your visit is ill-timed and most unwelcome. Your presence reminds me of the cruel wrong done to a noble friend, a devoted husband, whose worth I have learned only too late; whom I have loved unconsciously, only to discover the depth of my affection when its object is lost to me forever."

"You loved your husband!" cried Harcourt, with a cynical laugh; "you seem determined to astonish me to-day. You loved your husband?"

"Yes—dearly and truly; and love his memory better than ever I loved you. I have learned to think, since I have been released from your influence; for it was your influence that regulated my life as well as my husband's; it was your influence that kept us asunder, and plunged both of us into a whirlpool of dissipation. You are base enough to tell me that the world has linked my name with yours. I can afford to despise a world in which I have never found real happiness, and in which I no longer wish to hold a place. I shall go back to my father's house, and my life will be one long atonement for the past. I tell you this Mr. Lowther, in order that you may understand that we must be strangers to each other henceforward."

She laid her hand upon the bell as she spoke. Harcourt Lowther stood for some moments looking at her. A strange compound of passionate admiration and vengeful fury flamed in his eyes.

"I have sometimes wondered at the madmen who murder the women they have loved; but God help you, Maude Tredethlyn, if I had a loaded pistol in my pocket to-day!"

He folded his arms, locking them together with a convulsive snddenness, as if he could only thus restrain the impulse by which he would have struck her down where she stood defying him; and then he turned, and slowly left the room.

CHAPTER XLI.

SUSAN'S GOOD NEWS.

Maude Tredethlyn sat alone in her spacious chamber, thinking of the husband whom she had lost, and whose worth she had only discovered when it was too late. She would accept sympathy from no one. Julia wrote her letters, and saw people who must be seen, and was very good; but the wayward heart shrank away from her in its sudden desolation.

As she sat alone, upon the evening after her interview with Harcourt, her husband's image was more vividly present with her than it had been at any moment since his departure. She thought of him, with her face hidden in her hands, and her aching head lying wearily on the sofa-cushion. She thought of him until a nervous restlessness came upon her, and she sprang suddenly to her feet, unable to bear the oppression of that dreary room, or any room in that dreary house.

She crossed the room hurriedly, and rang the bell. She had told her maid to bring lights only when she rang for them. When the candles came, Maude went to a writing-table, and wrote a few hasty lines to her husband's simple little cousin. She had written to Susan once before, to tell her of Francis Tredethlyn's departure; but the two women had not seen each other since their first meeting.

My Dear Susan: There is terrible news of your cousin: it may have reached you before this, perhaps. Will you come to me? I am so utterly miserable, and I believe that you are the only person in the world who can understand my sorrow. Come, dear, I implore you. Ever your affectionate Maude.

Maude slept soundly that night for the first time since the tidings of the Kingfisher's fate had reached her, and woke in the morning to see Susan looking down at her with a smile upon her face.

"Ah, you don't know," cried Maude—you don't know what has happened: you haven't heard?"

"O! what, dear?" Susan asked gently.

"The loss of the Kingfisher—the fire—the dreadful fire! Oh, Susan you cannot have heard!"

Mrs. Tredethlyn said this, because the girl's face, though it was grave and sad, expressed none of that acute anguish which Susan ought to have felt for her cousin's untimely fate. She only looked at Maude with a wondering earnestness.

"Yes, it was very dreadful," she said. "Mrs. Clinnock read it in the paper, and told me. I am so sorry for all the sufferers. But oh, Maude, dear cousin, how grateful we ought to be for the accident that saved Francis from such a fate! If he had gone by that vessel, dear ——"

She stopped suddenly, for Maude looked at her with an unnatural stare, and then fell back unconscious.

No, he had not perished with the ill-fated passengers of the Kingfisher. Lives as noble had gone down to the deep waters; but Francis Tredethlyn had not made a part in the mighty sacrifice. When Maude recovered from the deadly faintness that had come upon her, Susan showed her a letter which she had received from her cousin—a letter that had been written in a hotel at Plymouth after the sailing of the Kingfisher. It was a kind, kinsmanlike letter, stating the arrangements which the writer had made for the comfort and welfare of his cousin and child; and, in conclusion, Francis told Susan that he had reached Plymouth too late to leave by the Kingfisher. Thus left with his time on his hands for some days, he had resolved on going to have a look at the old neighborhood once more.

"It might seem a foolish fancy to many people, but I don't think it will to you, Susy," he wrote. "I want to gather a handful of daisies from my mother's grave before I leave the soil that holds her forever. I want to stand by the old hearth once more, though God knows what a pain it will be to me to see strangers in the old home. God bless you, dear, and good-by! I shall not write again till I write from the New World."

This was the close of the letter which Susan gave Maude to read. Her first feeling on reading it was unbounded gratitude to the Providence that had saved Francis Tredethlyn. Her second feeling was considerable indignation against Francis himself.

Then she was grateful to Providence again, and angry with herself for having been angry with Francis; and then she pounced upon Susan and kissed her.

"What am I to do, darling?" she asked; "I daresay he has gone off by some other horrible steamer. But wherever he is, I won't stop idle in this dreary house. I won't trust everything to that slow solemn lawyer. I'll go to Cornwall myself, and find out all about my husband; how long he stayed there, and when he left. You'll tell me where to go, won't you?"

Of course Susan was ready to give her cousin's wife all needful information about that forgotten corner of the earth, Landresdale. She would have volunteered to accompany Maude to the western moors, but Maude declared she wanted no one to accompany her.

"I suppose I must take my maid," she said; "but I shall leave her at the inn at Falmouth, and go alone to that queer old house on the moor, and those queer old people Francis once told me about."

That day, while Maude was making preparations for her departure, Susan sat in the morning-room with Julia, when the door was suddenly opened by an impetuous hand, and Miss Grunderson burst in upon them more intensely pink than usual."

"They wanted me to go to the drawing-room, and they'd go and see if Mrs. Tredethlyn was at home!" exclaimed Rosa. "I know what their going and seeing is. Not at home, always; and I do so want to see that poor darling."

Julia interrupted Miss Grunderson with a simple statement of the fact which had put an end to Maude's brief time of mourning. Rosa's delight was very genuine, and on being introduced to Mrs. Lesley she expanded as it was her wont to expand on all occasions.

"You can't think how glad I am!" she exclaimed; "for I assure you when I heard of that dreadful event, I felt as if it was quite hard hearted of me to be happy, and I have been very happy for the last week or so. In point of fact," added Miss Grunderson, dragging at the button of a very light glove, "I'm going to be married."

"Indeed!" said Julia, politely.

"Yes. You see as par has long objected to my running after public characters, which of course was tiresome to him—so when Mr. Lowther—Mr. Roderick Lowther, you know—proposed, par happening to be in a good temper, it was all settled immediately."

Miss Grunderson entertained the two ladies for some time with minute details of her own affairs, and she confessed presently that Roderick had promised to call for her.

"He doesn't want to see Mrs. Tredethlyn, you know," she said; "he was only anxious to express to you how sorry he is, and so on—though, of course, now he hasn't any occasion to be sorry, thank goodness! but you don't mind his coming to fetch me, do you, dear? The carriage is waiting for me, and I'm going to take him on to the Haymarket. And I'm to go down to Lowther Hall to stay before our marriage; and I'm to be introduced to a maiden aunt of Roderick's from whom he has expectations this very afternoon—I mean I'm to be introduced to her this very afternoon," added Rosa.

While she was chattering, the door opened, and a servant announced Mr. Lowther. As he looked about him, unaccustomed to the obscurity, he heard a faint shriek, and a woman who had been sitting with her back to the window started suddenly from her chair.

"Robert!" she cried; "Robert, is it you?" And then she sank down again, pale and breathless.

"Robert!" exclaimed Miss Grunderson; "you must mistake Mr. Lowther for some one else, Mrs. Lesley. His name is not Robert."

"Perhaps not," Susan answered sadly. "He kept his real name a secret from the poor girl who was once proud to call herself his wife; but whatever his name may be, he is my husband, nevertheless, and Providence has brought about our meeting to-day. Oh, don't add a falsehood to the wrong you have done me!" she cried, appealing to Roderick, who stood pale and confounded. "I shall claim very little of you. I only want you to give me the name I have a right to bear; I only want you to acknowledge your son."

Roderick Lowther did not reply to this appeal. After a moment's pause he turned to Julia:

"Where do you pick up your acquaintance, Miss Desmond? I should scarcely have expected to meet this lady here."

"This lady is my husband's cousin," answered Maude, who had entered the room while he was speaking; "and I do not know any one who has a better right to be here. What is the matter, Susy, darling?"

"There is nothing that can be spoken of here," Susan answered; "I have met some one whom I never expected to see again. I will wait till my cousin Francis comes back. I will say no more till then."

"But, good gracious me!" exclaimed Miss Grunderson, "I'm not going to be treated in this sort of way. What does it all mean, Roderick? That lady starts up all of a sudden, and calls you her husband, and then says she'll wait till her cousin comes home. I can't be expected to wait till her cousin comes home. I can't take matters so coolly. With my trousseau ordered, and all! I must and will have an explanation!"

"You shall, Rosa; but for mercy's sake hold your tongue. There is some infernal mistake. You had better go home; never mind about the ear-rings to-day. If this lady mistakes me for some one she knows, or has a claim upon, I have no doubt I shall be able to demonstrate her mistake, if I can talk to her for a few minutes quietly. And now let me take you to your carriage, Rosa."

Rosa would have resisted such a summary way of disposing of her and her wrongs; but Roderick was firm. He led her down stairs, and he put her into her carriage, and he sent her home as coolly as if she had been a packet of dry goods consigned to his temporary care, to be quietly sent on to Mr. Grunderson.

He looked very grave as he went to Mrs. Tredethlyn's morning-room to demand an interview with Susan; but he looked a great deal more grave as he left the house after that interview and made his way back to his brother's lodgings.

He found Harcourt with the slim foreign bottle on the table by his side.

"What is the matter with you?" asked the younger brother.

"There is this much the matter with me," answered Roderick: "I trusted a fellow to help me in a delicate business, and I've reason to think that he took advantage of my confidence to get me into a dilemma that it will take me all my life to get out of. I have seen Susan Turner to-day."

"Indeed."

"And she has told me something about the Registrar. Do you remember what I asked you to do for me, Harcourt?"

"Perfectly. And I have got the letter containing your request in my possession—such a nice letter! You tell me in it that you have fallen over head and ears with an innocent little country girl, too poor and insignificant to be your wife, too virtuous to be your mistress. Another man might have accepted his fate, and either resigned the lady, or made some sacrifice of his own interests and married her. You were inclined to do neither, and you fell back upon a villainous expedient familiar to the readers of old-fashioned novels, and known as a mock marriage. Let me tell you that, as you never in your life did a generous thing for me, it wasn't very likely that I should get myself into a legal hobble. I didn't wish to be too disobliging, so I arranged a marriage, but it was a real and not a sham one; and you are as tightly tied to your pretty little wife as if the business had been transacted at St. George's, Hanover Square."

"You are a remorseless scoundrel!" exclaimed Mr. Lowther coolly. "And I am very happy to tell you that your own pretty little plans are knocked on the head. Francis Tredethlyn did not sail in the Kingfisher."

Harcourt gave a little start of surprise, but his countenance did not express profound vexation. The schemer had failed so completely, that it mattered very little to him now what course events took.

"Yes, Francis Tredethlyn is alive and well, I have no doubt," resumed Roderick. "And my little Susy turns out to be Francis Tredethlyn's first cousin."

"Then the likeness which I fancied I saw in that daub of a portrait and the similarity of name were not mere coincidents, after all," muttered Harcourt. "And the lady at Petersham is my little sister-in-law. It's a pity you didn't treat her a little better," he added; "for Francis Tredethlyn could afford to give her a handsome fortune if he pleased. It was from her father he inherits his money; and if you had declared your marriage, and made things square with the old man, your wife need not have been disinherited, and would have been as rich a prize as any Miss Grunderson."

"Hold your tongue!" cried Roderick; "I know what I have lost as well as you do. If you had been aboveboard with me, and told me that you had sold me about the marriage, I might have acted differently. Why did you get me into such a mess?"

"Because I didn't choose to be your catspaw. I have been sacrificed to your interests all my life, and I was determined to keep my hold upon you when I'd got it."

"And you would have allowed me to marry Rosa Grunderson?"

"C'est selon! I think I should have spoken at the last minute."

"You are a scoundrel!"

"And you are—I can't finish the sentence without sinking to slang."

In this fashion the brothers bandied civilities for some time; but they ended matters by dining together at the Metropolitan.

Warmed by a good dinner and a bottle of Moselle, Roderick grew hopeful as to the future.

"Looking at it in any way, Rosa was a nuisance," said Mr. Lowther, "and perhaps it's better as it is."

CHAPTER XLII.

Maude left Paddington by an afternoon express. At Landersdale she procured a vehicle to take her to Tredethlyn Grange. The way seemed intolerably long to her; but at last she saw a gray spot against the blue sky: the gray spot grew bigger and bigger against the horizon, until it grew at last into a dreary-looking habitation, with quaint old gables and moss-grown stone walls.

Maude looked hopelessly at the quiet house—so little sign of occupation, so little token of life.

"He can't be there," she thought, a sudden gush of tears shutting out the gray stone walls, the clover-fields and browsing sheep. "I am too late!"

She brushed away her tears, drew down her veil, and alighted, telling the driver to wait for her; as she approached the door it was opened by a tall, gaunt woman, who had evidently been disturbed by the unwonted sound of wheels on the rough moorland road.

"Mr. Tredethlyn has been staying here, has he not?" Maude asked, eagerly.

"Yes, ma'am; and he's here still. Excuse me for being a little put out like, but you have taken me so aback. You don't happen to be my master's wife, do you?"

"Yes, yes. Oh, thank heaven he is still here! Let me see him at once, please!" exclaimed Maude, trying to pass the grim-looking woman who barred her passage.

"Not yet! oh, please, ma'am, not yet!" cried the woman, eagerly. "It mightn't be safe."

"Not safe! What do you mean?"

"He has been so ill, ma'am; and the doctor's special orders was, to be kept from anything that might upset him. And he talked and raved so about you, poor dear, when his senses were quite gone, as they were for weeks together; and I'm sure nothing could upset him so much as the sight of your coming upon him sudden. Let me see him first, and tell him you are here. I make no doubt he'll be overjoyed to see you—but it must'nt come like a shock upon him."

"He has been ill!" cried Maude; "dangerously ill!"

"Yes, ma'am; very dangerously. We had two doctors with him at one time. Brain-fever it was; over-fatigue and trouble of the mind, and so on, the doctors said. He came up here after being too late for the steamer by which he was to have gone abroad; and he came to settle everything about the farm and the quarries, and so on; and he worked at it night and day, without rest nor sleep, though me and my husband told him how bad it was for him; and everything was almost settled when he woke one morning bad in his head, and after that got from bad to worse, until his life was almost give up."

"But he is out of danger now?"

"Yes, ma'am, thank God, quite out of danger now; but oh, so weak; the smallest child that ever I had to do with wasn't weaker than my poor master now. If you'll walk in there, ma'am, I'll go and see him."

She said no more, but departed, and Maude crept into the old-fashioned room, fearful lest the rustling of her silk dress might disturb an invalid's slumber. It seemed a long time that she waited, and then Mrs. Dryscoll returned, smiling grimly this time.

"He'll see you directly minute," she said; "and oh, he does seem so pleased, poor dear!"

She led Maude to the top of the staircase, and then pointed to a half-open door at the end of a corridor. The young wife entered the room in which her husband lay on a white-curtained bed, very pale, very wan, and so weak that he could not raise his hand to offer it her in token of loving reconciliation. She fell on her knees by the bed, and laid her cheek upon the hand that was too weak to be lifted.

"Oh, forgive me!" she said; "my dear, my love, my true and cherished husband! If you wanted to give me a lesson, you have given me a very cruel one; but you have taught me that I cannot live without you."

She sat by his pillow with his weak head encircled by her caressing arms, and told him the story of her penitence and remorse. It was a sweet exchange of forgiveness for the past, and tender promises of love for the future.

After this Mrs. Tredethlyn had no more to do but to nurse her husband through the slow stages of convalescence. It was very long before he was strong enough to get up to a little Arcadian tea-drinking. It was very long after that before he was able to take a few turns in the clover-field, leaning on his wife's arm; still longer before he was well enough to think of turning his back upon Cornwall, and plunging into busy commonplace life again.

If he could have been an invalid all the rest of his life, he would have resigned himself uncomplainingly to his fate; for what period of his chequered existence had been so sweet as this, in which he and Maude were all in all to each other?—this perpetual tete-a-tete, unbroken by the intrusion of morning callers, undisturbed by the conflicting emotions which attend social intercourse in high latitudes. And they were not idle either during these autumn months. Hidden among these wild Cornish moors, the husband and wife were very busy together—improving their minds; for Maude had confessed to her husband, with a good deal of girlish giggling and blushing, that her own education had been very nearly as defective as his, and that the wide fields of knowledge, which were such strange and bewildering regions to him, were scarcely more familiar to her.

"And you are so clever, Frank," she exclaimed in conclusion; she always called him Frank now. "You remember what those American phrenologists—Messrs. Somebody & Something—said about your perceptive faculties? You could learn anything, they said. And we'll learn together, dear, for I'm ashamed to say I've forgotten everything my governesses and masters taught me, except French and music, and a smattering of German and Italian. And I'm sure if you'd seen how, as soon as one master had beaten anything into my brains, another master came and beat it out again with something else, you'd scarcely wonder that I'm ignorant. So we'll begin together, Frank, dear, and learn everything. Won't it be fun?"

A young lady who looked upon the acquisition of universal knowledge as an agreeable joke would scarcely be expected to drink very deeply of the Pierian spring. Maude imbibed the classic waters in little fitful sips, and wasted a good deal of it in frolicsome splashing; but Francis had read considerably, even in the midst of his London dissipation, and he had a happy knack of remembering what he read.

"We have been so happy here, Francis," Maude said one dim November evening, as the husband and wife walked side by side upon the moorland before the Grange; "but I think we have learned to understand each other so well now that no one in the world will be able to divide us again. And by and by, when you have read a great deal about Julius Cæsar and political economy, and so on, and go into the House"—Maude opened her eyes to the widest extent as she pronounced the high-sounding substantive—"how proud I shall be of you; and I shall go to the ladies' gallery when you are going to speak. Then, when you have settled all about the Berkshire estate, how delightful it will be to arrange our model farm, and model stables, and pineries, and vineries, and conservatories, and orchid-houses, and a model dairy, and a model poultry-yard, almost as pretty as the one at Frogmore, and then how much we shall have to think of and talk about shan't we, Frank?"

"And you'll never be ashamed of me again, Maude?"

"Ashamed of you," cried Mrs. Tredethlyn innocently, "was I ever ashamed of you?" And then she looked at her husband archly, blushing and laughing. "Well, perhaps once, when you knocked those petits timballe de gibier into the duchess's lap, half a dozen of them, at the very least, Frank; and the night you tore Lady Aphelia Fitzormond's old point; but you are so refined, Frank, so improved, if I may venture to say as much without offending you."

"I should be a churlish brute indeed if I had not improved in the society of the sweetest wife in Christendom, to say nothing of Julius Cæsar. My great-grandfather was a gentleman, Maude, and there are few names older even than Tredethlyn in this land of ancient lineages. We dropped down until we came to be represented by my grandfather, who lived like a peasant for the sake of hoarding his money, and in whose steps my Uncle Oliver followed. I shall try to make myself a gentleman for your sake, Maude—it would never do for people to say that the lovely Mrs. Tredethlyn had allied herself to a man who was only a clod."

After this, need it be said that all went on very smoothly with Mr. and Mrs. Tredethlyn—so smoothly that poor discontented Julia abandoned the happy couple in disgust, and went abroad as traveling companion to a rheumatic old countess, who leads her a dreadful life, and insists upon being read to sleep out of German metaphysical works at wierd hours of the night. She has met with Roderick Lowther in the course of her travels—lonely and cynical, looking at everything in life through the medium of his own disappointments.

They are very happy, Francis and Maude. As time speeds on, there appears upon the lawn in Berkshire a little rolling bundle of white muslin and expensive lace, which, inspected closely, turns out to be a baby, and which, if it could speak at all, would answer to the name of Lionel Hillary Tredethlyn, and by and by, when the young couple travel in the bright autumn weather, a prim English nurse and a French bonne follow in their rear, and there is a little girl baby in a white hood, and papa and mamma are alike concerned for the safe conveyance of these domestic treasures. The girl baby is called Maude, but she owns a string of other names, and her two godmothers are Susan Lowther, who lives happily with her boy in the Petersham cottage, and Rosa Grunderson, who declares that in consequence of the distracting influence of public characters, and her fatal experience of the perfidy of private individuals in the person of Roderick Lowther, she will descend a spinster to the grave.

One day, at a German watering-place, they hear of a man living in the same hotel with them, their countryman, a man who is young, and has been handsome, and who for the last few months has been conspicuous in the gaming-saloons of the Kursaal as a desperate, and sometimes a very lucky player—a traveller, who can scarcely be an adventurer, for he has been admired and caressed by elegant women and well-born men, but who has been a hard drinker from first to last, and within the last fortnight has fallen a victim to the most hideous disease which vice ever engendered as the scorpion-whip to work its own retribution—a disease called delirium tremens. The landlord of the hotel tells Mr. Tredethlyn how this wretched Englishman has his bad fits and his intervals of quiet; how he will lie down calmly enough perhaps at night, to start up mad in the dim gray morning; to walk long distances, hurrying wildly before the fiend that pursues him; and to fall exhausted in some desolate spot and lie there, till some passing peasant picks him up and conveys him back to his lodging. The landlord describes, with considerable vivacity and gesticulation, how this poor afflicted creature will sit for hours together, catching at imaginary insects that cling about him and torment him; how he will watch and point to falling snow, that never falls; how, with a power that is hideously graphic, he will describe the devils that dance and gibber round his miserable bed. He tells Francis Tredethlyn, in confidence, that the poor ailing wretch is all but penniless, and that very scanty supplies of money come to him in reply to the letters he writes to England now and then in his rational moments.

It scarcely needed Maude's appealing look to inspire Francis with the wish to help this unhappy countryman. He says nothing to his wife, but goes by-and-by to smoke his cigar in the lamp-lit quadrangle, where there is a café, and a smoking-room, and a reading-room, and a post-office, and a perpetual clatter of divers tongues, and clatter of hurrying feet. He is a long time smoking that cigar; and yet Maude feels no displeasure in his absence, as she sits alone in her balcony looking out at the lamplit town and the solemn forest looming darkly in the distance. She knows that whatever impulse stirs her own heart, is almost sure to find an answering impulse in her husband's; and she can guess what keeps him so long to-night.

He has spoken to the landlord, he tells her, when he comes back, and has given him a cheque, which is to keep things smooth for the present; and has promised more money if more should be needed; for in any case the Englishman is not to be worried about money matters while he is ill; and above all he is not to know that a stranger's help has saved him from annoyance.

"The landlord persuaded me to go into the—poor fellow's room, afterwards," said Francis, slowly. "He thought it would cheer him up a little to shake a countryman by the hand; and I did go in, Maude, and I saw him."

"Yes, dear; and the interview has made you unhappy, I'm sure. You are looking so dreadfully pale."

"The man is very ill, Maude. Yes, the sight of him did almost knock me over, I assure you."

It was a week after this when Mr. and Mrs. Tredethlyn left the German watering-place. They were on the point of starting from the hotel when Maude noticed the closed shutters of some windows on an upper story, and, on questioning one of the waiters, was told that the Englishman was dead. She asked her husband to tell her more about the painful end of this lonely Englishman, as they sat alone in the coupe of a railway carriage.

"Yes, he is dead, Maude!" Francis answered sadly. "It was a very melancholy fate. The doctors could not conquer the sleeplessness, and he sank at last into a state of coma from which he never rallied. I left all necessary directions, and I have written to his friends in England. He was no friend of mine, but there seems something very shocking in this solitary death in a strange country."

"He was no friend of yours!" repeated Maude, wonderingly; "how can you say that, Frank? You knew him, then."

"Yes, Maude, and you knew him, too. The man who died last night was Harcourt Lowther."

THE END.

Judge Clark decided in Sacramento last week that the gambling law does not justify the indictment of any persons except the proprietors of the game, or the building in which gaming is conducted. Under the ruling ten men were discharged who had been arrested for gambling.

In Sacramento, recently, a woman procured the release of her husband from jail, and that night ran off with another fellow. Her object in procuring her husband's release, was to leave somebody with the children.

Good Ore.—At Markleeville, Alpine county, the Lady Franklin Company reached their lode lately, and found ore of a rich quality. It is supposed to be worth $2,000 a foot.

"MRS. GRUNDY."

THIS, the latest satirical enterprise of Eastern humorists whose coming has been favorably announced by the Atlantic press, has finally made its appearance. The first number does not seem particularly brilliant; indeed, the only noticeable feature of this new American Punch is its title page, which gives some striking likenesses of celebrities of State, War, Politics and Literature. If we may judge from the present number, Mrs. Grundy is inferior to the defunct Vanity Fair, the Lantern, etc., and scarcely compares with our own Puck. Possibly some improvement may be made on this specimen number, and in the meantime our readers may waive their criticisms on the following selections:

"On Woman's Dress.—The more the stupendous nature of a subject seizes upon the mind, the more—well, it is hardly worth while to say what we were going to say, but of such is Woman's dress. We are sure of our ground here, because we were told so by a young married man. This young man, who is trustworthy, although not secretive, also informed us—but it might look like a breach of confidence on our part to commit to type the substance of his communication. He who would violate the faith reposed in him in such matters, deserves to be tried before a Military Commission; but, because a young man happens to find a Rat on his dressing-table one morning, shall we, therefore, surge wildly upon the conclusion that Nature has permanently given place to Artificial Padding? Naturam expellas furca, says Horace. 'You may expel Nature with a Fork;' 'but,' adds he subsequently, 'You would be a Spoon to think that she won't find her way back again.' Such aphorisms as this are assuring to the mind, but we cannot help wishing that Horace had said when. To recur to the subject in hand, however, we will enforce our position by relating the following anecdote, imparted to us by a celebrated Dress-maker, Madame ——. This lady positively assured us that the story is strictly true in all its details. But we fear we could hardly do justice to it in our way of telling. Broken English is absolutely essential to point the moral and adorn the tale of some raconteurs, and we have always found ours very hard to break. One of the young ladies to whom we were engaged at any early period of our life, had a very pretty way of —; and yet, what business is it of a public Journalist to introduce the Corset into the witness-box? Rather than implicate ourselves in any such proceeding, we will pass on to another branch of the subject.

"There was a pretty Italian Marquise who occupied apartments on the the same étage with us in a hotel of Paris. One day, as we were going down stairs, we met the blanchisseuse of this Marquise coming up with a large basket, covered with a cloth of snowy whiteness, on her arm. Something in our appearance, we suppose, startled this middle-aged person, for she tripped, and rotated heavily to the landing below. In the fall the cloth was riven from the basket, the contents of which were scattered about on the —; but, really, we do not feel that we have any right to discuss this subject at all. We regret that we should have committed ourself to it, and we decline to add another word."

"A Petition to His Excellency, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.—Your Excellency is undoubtedly aware that, during the past four years, this country has been the scene of a Fratricidal Struggle, now terminated by the victory of the National Arms over the Insurgents.

"Your Excellency may furthermore have taken notice that the daily Press of this city of New York has been in the habit of referring to the Fratricidal Struggle hereinbefore mentioned.

"Now your Petitioners do declare, that the references on the part of the daily Press to the said struggle, commonly known and recognized under the title of 'War News,' have for the past four years constituted the entire interest of the said daily Press.

"And your Petitioners do also declare, that with the termination of the Fratricidal Struggle, the War News has also terminated, so that the daily Press has been devoid of interest.

"Wherefore, your Petitioners do now pray that Your Excellency will inaugurate another Struggle—Fratricidal or Otherwise—at your earliest convenience, in order that your Petitioners may continue to find in the daily Press that interest which it has lost since the cessation of hostilities, and without which it may be truly denominated 'stale, flat, and unprofitable.' "Two Ways of 'Seeing' It.—Meyerbeer, no doubt, wrote the title of his last Opera thus 'L'Africane.' But, from the manner in which it is viewed by certain critics, they evidently take the name for a joke, and read it thus: Laugh-Ricane!

"Why not at once pretend that the title is a delicate homage to the Emperor's Algerian escapade, and write it thus: L'Afrique-N?"

REUNION CAROL.

JULY 4, 1865.

TWINE roses round the sabre's sheath,
With olive bough and myrtle wreath
Make every flagstaff gay.
Let North and South, palm pressed to palm—
One people—chaunt the old-time psalm
Of Liberty to-day.

Beside the grave of the dead past
A new nativity we cast,
A future graud we will;
And coming centuries, as they flee,
Our multiplying stars shall see
One constellation still.

Salute once more, repentant South,
From the unshotted cannon's mouth,
The Union's glorious Fourth.
Let Yorktown's salvos shake the sky,
And Bunker Hill make glad reply
In thunder, for the North.
"Peace hath her victories!" her hand
Shall seed the plains by Slaughter banned,
And reap their golden store.
The Nation's wounds her lips divine
Shall close, with kisses' anodyne,
To open nevermore.

To open nevermore—for War
Hath broken down the only bar
To endless brotherhood.
Lo! purged by Battle's red assay
Of Slavery's stain, our land to-day
Is Freedom's Holy Rood!

And far and wide, within the pale,
To-day a brotherly "All Hail!"
Shall thrill the trembling wires;
And from New England's mountains white
To Carolina's swamps, to-night,
Shall sparkle festive fires.

Henceforth be vengeful thoughts forsworn,
All taunts that foster hate forborne
By patriot lips; and when
Justice to Mercy leans her ear,
Let the strong North, too strong to fear,
Say, heartily, Amen!

Right is supreme. The conflict o'er,
To raise, regenerate, restore,
Is every good man's aim.
Havoc has done its work, and now
Must follow in its track the plough,
The desert to reclaim.

Labor the scars of war shall hide
With teeming harvests—fields blood-dyed
A purer tint shall know.
Tall corn shall plume the Southern knolls,
Cane gild the plains, and cotton-bolls
The uplands swathe with snow.

Hurrah! as Fourth to Fourth succeeds,
The land of mighty thoughts and deeds
Shall keep its place, the van,
And he—whatever may debase,
In other lands, the human race—
The land where man is MAN.

THE STUDY OF NATURE.

TO study any department of human knowledge successfully, an ardent temperament is certainly required. Apathy and indiffereuce cannot insure success, as they will never stimulate to application, nor create that inflexibility and pertinacity of purpose necessary to the faithful performance of any task. To study uature the student must become impressed with the beauty of the work before him. With the poet he must feel that:

"Light is Truth, and God is Light;'

and that to acquire this light in its greatest effulgence, ardent study is uecessary. It is only when we feel the full force of the poet's language that the acquisitiou of science begins to exert its proper and beneficial effects upon the mind:

"My heart is awed within me, when I think
Of the great miracle which still goes on
In silence round me—the perpetual work
Of thy creation, finished, yet renewed Forever!"

And it is only after sustaining the toil incident upon scientific inquiry, after having mastered its drudgery, and gone into the portals of the temple, that we experience the significance of these beautiful words:

"There is a language by the lonely shore—
There is society where none intrude—
By the deep sea—and music in its roar."

It is there that we begin to feel that the deep waters, as they give out their increasing anthems, not only present music to the ear, but are eloquent with harmonies to the mind; and that that solitude where none intrude, is blessed with the society of a thousand intelligences more welcome and grateful often than the dearest friends.

For we soon learn the instructive lesson that "there is not a mote in the beam, not au herb on the mountain, not a pebble on the shore, not a seed far blown into the wilderness, hut contributes to the law that seeks in all the principles of life—the beautiful, the joyous, the immortal." Are these things to be cast aside by the proudest iutellect? Should we disregard these slight changes silently as they are effected and attended with such great results? The eloquent Chalmers says: "In the leaves of every forest, in the flowers of every garden, in the waters of every rivulet, there are worlds teeming with life and numberless as are the glories of the firmament." The noblest intellects that have existed, have not deemed anything too minute nor trivial to claim their serious study and their pens. It will be seen that they, too, have observed for days and years; have thought and reasoned, and from such things, have derived those lessons of wisdom which have rendered their names illustrious.

The study of natural history is within the reach of every one, and he who is engaged iu it is presented at every step in his progress with something capable of awakening pleasing emotions. The whole earth is to him a vast museum, in which are crowded beautiful and sublime objects, animate and inanimate, in an almost endless variety, all combining to cultivate the intellect and gladden the heart. The search into nature produces also a highly beneficial effect on the understanding. Mathematics do not more effectually strengthen and discipline the judgment. By a continual analysis, camparison and generalization of things, the study of natural history teaches the art of thinking clearly and accurately, and of reasoning with precision and force, with a much less degree of weariness than that which usually accompanies the study of simple quantities and mere abstract forms.

An attention to natural objects also improves the taste—nature is the admitted staudard of perfection. The student who is closely examining the proportions of her inimitable forms, is taking the surest way to acquire a correct judgment of what is fit and elegant. It exercises at the same time a powerful and salutary iufluence over the affections. There are studies which have a tendency to deaden the feelings and render the heart callous to the best moral impressions; but by fixing the mind ou living objects, in which wisdom and goodness are strikingly exhibited, and by raising it through them to the Creator, in whom is all created perfection and happiness, the study of natural objects excites a continual train of ideas most friendly to whatever is pure, benevolent and grateful. Works of art—the finest specimens of human skill—when seen under a powerful magnifier, are rude and imperfect. Not so the with the works of creation—these have a perfect finish, so far as human instruments have ever been able to follow them. The wings and legs of the smallest insects are as smoothly polished as the largest objects. The minute sap-vessels of a plant appear like the most perfect cut-glass. This perfection pervades all nature. Every tree is so wonderfully constructed that the most ingenious man could not manufacture even a single branch or leaf by the labors of a lifetime. Nature always joins the useful to the agreeable, the substantial to the elegant. Her works have no superfluous decorations; every beauty displayed there is found to be necessary. Even the brilliant and variegated colors which adorn the flowers, butterflies and birds, and which are apparently accidental, prove useful in distinguishing the almost innumerable tribes of this portion of her empire.

Nature is so beautiful!—always so beautiful. Oh, it is the saddest of all things, that even one human soul should dimly perceive the beauty that is ever around us, a "perpetual benediction." Nature, that great missionary of the Most High, preaches to us forever in all tones of love, and writes truth in all colors, on manuscript illuminated with stars and flowers. To those who rise above custom and fashion, and dare to trust their own wings ever so little above the crowd, how eagerly does she throw her garland ladders to tempt them upwards! And how beautiful, how angelic, seems every fragment of life that appears earnest and true! "By plain and pleasant symbols is Nature forever teaching us—entreating us to come out and sit with her at the feet of her Great Author. Her 'tongues in the running brooks' are always tuneful; her 'sermons in stones' never rugged; her 'good in everything' is always easy of extraction."

Every study, the pursuit of which leads the student out into the fields or woods, to observe in minute detail the wonderful works of the Author of Nature, and learn how "in wisdom he hath made them all"—every such study is alike healthful to body and miud. The botanist with his fragrant wild flowers and wreathed garlands; the entomologist with his insect train, and all their wonderful translormations and beautiful forms; the mineralogist with his no less astonishing and interesting details—all have their respective claims on our notice.

The love of nature requires no peculiar circumstances. Its sphere is wherever the sun is shining, because it addresses itself to what the listless call weeds and stones, finding poetry and delight where the dull cry, All is barren. It revels iu a glorious landscape, but where the landscape is not, it constructs one in miniature for itself. Nothing iu the world is absolutely uninteresting to it, nor can be—what is there indeed that, iu any relation, has lost its primal quality of "very good?"

What is there that we should not estcem it a privilege to possess, although it be "common?" Is it nothing to have the frost-flowers on the window-panes? Is it nothing to have the blue sky? Is it nothing to have the stars and the rainbow? Oh, what grand and awful things surround us, if we will but look forth upon them! But because they are "without money and without price," we make nought of them, refusing to enjoy, because acceptance and admiration alone are asked. That sublime sense of the wonderful which they excite in us when children, is one of the sentiments we should most anxiously keep alive.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE ABROAD.

WE select the following items from the New York Review:

Wagner's opera, Tristan and Isolde, has at length been produced. The event took place at Munich on the 10th of June. The Signale gives a very friendly account of the work.

The Abbe Liszt has expressed his intention of writing a fantasia on L'Africaine.

Medi, by Cherubini, has been produced successfully at Her Majesty's Theatre, London. Tietjens and Santley were good, but little Laura Harris did not give satisfaction as "Dirce."

There is a cheap theatre in Paris, where a new singer has appeared, who is said to be a great deal more indecent, and therefore more interesting to the Parisians, than even Theresa. Her name is not given. Theresa's voice is reported to be what the German's call a "beer-bass."

Madame Caroline Duprez did not succeed at Covent Garden in her performance of the North Star.

It has been stated that Liszt has been nominated "Monsignore" by His Holiness the Pope. Perhaps he may become Pope, as he esteems himself to be the Pope in music, although in this respect he certainly is not infallible.

Mdlle. Ilma de Murska seems to have created a perfect furore in London, and even pretty little Patti's nose is in danger of being put out.

Thomas Loewe, the well-known author, has composed a symphonic work, the Night, in the style of David's Desert.

We learn from the Albion that the new English tenor, Mr. Hohler, who has recently created a furore in Milan, was formerly private secretary to the Earl of Dudley.

In a letter to that singular periodical Le Nain Jaune, M. Offenbach gives out a programme of his coming deeds, spirited enough to make lazy musicians wink. He is at work on a two-act opera for Ems, on a three-act opera for Les Bouffes of Paris, which theatre he consents to take anew in hand, and on the "great winter piece" for the Variétés, a setting of the story of Bluebeard.

Donizetti's forty-second opera, Maria Stuarda, written for Naples iu 1834, and then prohibited by the censorship, appeared the other day. After a moment's doubt at the outset, its success is said to be assured—so much so, indeed, as to induce the powers that be to take the ban off another prohibited opera, the Virginia of Signor Mercadante, which will also be produced at the Teatro San Carlo.

Three friends were promenading, a number of years ago, on the Boulevards of Paris. Iu the course of conversation one of them remarked. "I should like to take a good luncheon, if one could be obtained for about ten francs."

"I would not care if it were even cheaper," replied another of the friends.

"And I should like to take anything which could be called a lunch," added the last friend.

"Where can we get ten francs?" asked the first speaker.

"Hold on!" exclaimed the second young man; "I have an idea! Come along with me."

And they went together to a music store, which they entered, led by the friend who had "the idea."

The young man stepped up to the music dealer's desk and said: "Sir, we have come to offer you a new song. The words are by this gentleman, the music by the other, and I will sing it for you!" and he accordingly sat down and performed it.

"Well," said the publisher, after having heard the music, "I confess that the song is very simple, but I will take it for fifteen francs."

The bargain was immediately closed, and the three friends enjoyed a good dinner.

But who were they? Nobody but Alfred de Musset, the poet; Hippolyte Monpon, the composer; and Gilbert Louis Duprez, the tenor of tenors. The name of the song was "L'Andalouse," and it brought forty thousand dollars to the publisher.

THE RED HAT.

A LEGEND OF THE MALMAISON.

BY GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

ON the evening of a dark and rainy day in the month of December, 16—, a solitary horseman, wrapped in a large cloak might have been seeu spurring his jaded steed along the high road leading from Ruel towards the gloomy and antiquated chateau then the residence of the formidable prime-minister of Louis XIII., Armand du Plessis, Cardinal and Duke of Richelieu. Remember there was but one cavalier. Add another, and you might thiuk I was borrowing from the lameuted G. P. R. James.

This horseman drew bridle and dismounted at the door of a humb e little village-inn, bearing on its signboard the effigy of St. Nicholas, and which stood at the entrance to a gloomy avenue of poplars, at the opposite extremity of which was the chateau, and to which it served as a kind of lodge. The horseman wore a felt hat without plume, band or buckle; and his doublet of brown drugget destitute of either ribbons, lace, or embroidery, was sufficient to indicate, in an age when costume was so closely denoted the gradations of rank, that he did not belong to the patrician class; still, from his open and almost defiant countenance and cavalierly turned-up moustache, it was not difficult to pronounce him oue of those sturdy and independent burgesses whose fathers had fought in the wars of the League, aud who, temporarily kept in subjection by the iron hand of Richelieu, reappeared duriug the troubles of the Fronde, but were destined to be completely absorbed by the glory of the Grand Monarque. His horse appeared completely worn out, and the muddy state of his cloak testified to his having come a long distance by bad roads, in an age when all roads were execrable.

"May the plague light on the rogues who are bound to keep the kiug's highway in repair!" grumbled the traveller, as, tethering his steed to a post, he entered the inn, and proceeded to hammer with the butt-end of his whip upon a long table of coarse deal, which stood iu the midst of a low-ceiled, smoky common-room. A fat man of rotund abdomeu and purpled face, clad in the traditional white apron and night-cap, and with a knife in his girdle, for he was a cook as well as host, entered the room.

"What might your lordship be pleased to want?" he asked, pulling off his cap and making a lowly reverence.

"I am no lord, master of mine," twisting his moustache not without complacency; "but a plain burgess, who owes nothing, and asks for nothing without he can pay for it. I am hungered and athirst. Give me some supper; make up a blazing fire; see to my horse; aud I promise you that you shall have no reason to complain of me."

And as he spoke, the traveller struck his pocket, which gave forth a metallic chink pleasant to hear. The purple face of the innkeeper became one grin.

"We have not one room unoccupied," he said, "but my own private bedroom is at your grandeur's service. My wife shall make up a bed directly. As for the rest, you have but to wait a few miuutes, aud all your wishes shall be attended to."

Mine host was as good as his word. Ere long the traveller was comfortably stretched in a huge arm-chair, toasting his feet at a blazing fire, to which a couple of logs had beeu added. He could see through the casement that snnw was beginning to fall thickly; he could hear the wintry wind dolefully howling; a soft, warm odor from the kitchen began to titillate his nostrils, and he felt as cosy and complacent as men in all countries and ages have felt under similar circumstances.

"Come, this is better," he murmured, with a sigh of relief. "A dog's life is that of a traveller in December. May the black fever choke the cardinal—"

He bounded in his chair with terror; he was nearly falling into a swoon, as looking up, he saw the innkeeper, night-cap in hand standing before him.

"'Sdeath, man, what do you want?" he exclaimed, with ill-disguised trepidation.

"I am desirous," returned the other, with apparent embarrassment, "to ask a favor of your excellency."

The imprudent burgess breathed a little more freely after this, for he had expected nothing less than to be at once arrested by an exempt of his terrible eminence the cardinal.

"Ask what you will, my friend," he responded, in courteous tone.

"Only imagine, your highness," pursued the diplomatic innkeeper, twisting one of the corners of his apron, "that no sooner had my wife made your room comfortable and tidy for you than another customer arrived. He is an old customer, and a very good customer, too, for he only asks how much there is to pay, and allows me to tot up the reckoniug. Well, you see, your superiority, that I can't exactly turn him out of doors on such a night as this; so I've just come to ask your grace if you will allow him to share your fire and your supper till bed-time, when I must find him a shake-down somewhere."

"Is he an honest man, this customor of yours?" asked the traveller in a dignified tone.

If it were possible for the deep-tinted face of the innkeeper to assume an intenser hue, he may be said to have blushed.

"Yes, yes, your excelleucy," he replied. "he is honest—a very honest man, as houest men go, and iu his way of business."

"Tell him, then, that I shall be much pleased with his company, and that he is welcome to half my supper—the best half; and, hark ye, Mr. Landlord, see that it be good, and that the wine is of the right sort.

The innkeeper was profuse in his professions of gratitude and in promises of a speedy appearance of excellent cheer; and then he left the room, somewhat precipitately, as the traveller thought, to inform his customer of the result of his missiou.

In a minute or so the customer made his appearance. He was a strange customer—a curious customer—and, to tell the truth, somewhat of an ugly customer. He was very tall, very thin, had very harshly-marked features, very small gray eyes, whose lids drooped whenever he was looked full in the face, and a pointed beard and moustache, coarse and grizzled. His hands were knotted and bony, and of huge size. He was plainly dressed in a doublet, vest and trunks of gray serge, bordered with black taffety, and terminated by long boots of untauned leather; but the most noticeable poiut in his apparrel was his hat, which, of the same material as that of the traveller, and, like his, unadorned by feather or buckle, was of a dull crimson color.

"I don't like the look of that Robin Redhead," the traveller bethought himself. "His eminence wears a scarlet hat; but it has tassels and a broad brim. Who ever saw a peaceable citizen in such a blood-stained looking couvrechef as that?"

However, he was an open-hearted burgess; and, rising, held out his hand to the stranger, saying, "Welcome, sir and friend!"

To his surprise the man with the Red Hat drew back, as though half-alarmed and half astonished at this simple act of courtesy, and, instead of reciprocating it, contented himself with makiug a low bow.

"A very ceremonious personage, upon my word," mused the guest. "Perhaps he is a Huguenot; or, just as likely, a Catholic, and thinks I am a heretic. The spotted fever take all religious differences, say I!" Then, raising his voice, he said, "Sir, I am extremely happy to be able to offer you a share of my supper and—"

"A thousand thanks!" hastily interposed he of the Red Hat. Then diving into the recesses of a pouch at his belt, he produced a handful of silver and continued, "Take, I entreat you, what I have to pay as my share of the reckoning."

"Sir, sir," protested the traveller, drawing himself up, "do you take me for a niggard curmudgeon who expects a stranger to pay for the meal to which he invited him?"

"Invites! Do you mean to say that you invite me?" faltered the Red Hat.

"Of course I do. I told the landlord so," replied the other.

"Then," responded the Red Hat, with a very peculiar and not very pleasant smile, "I accept your invitation as heartily as it was given. This is the first time in my life that such a thing happened to me. But the sky has fallen, and we may expect to catch roast larks." And he drew a stool up to the fire, and began to bask and hug himself in the genial warmth.

Roast larks failed to come down; but a splendid roast goose just then came up, flanked by a hotch-potch of savory ingredients, and two portly pitchers of wine. The strangely-acquainted friends sat down to the table, and did the amplest justice to the edibles and potables; and so delighted did mine host seem with the appetites of his guests, that he insisted upon standing treat in more than one flask of his vintage.

"No doubt, sir," the Red Hat remarked, when the landlord had removed the fragments of the repast, and they were left alone, "that you are as well known as I am in this hostelry. Goodman Aubry waited on you as though you were a prince."

"Not in the least," replied the burgess, smiling. "But I just sounded my pocket, and he was content with the ring of the little livres Tournois."

His interlocutor smiled grimly, in his turn.

"Yes," he pursued, "gold has immense power in every country; still it is far from prudent to show the contents of one's pocket to everybody, especially in such a place as this."

The burgess looked at him uneasily.

"Do you mean that there are any pickpockets hereabouts, brother?" he asked.

"Do you mean to say that you are not acquainted with the neighborhood?" returned the other, answering one question by asking another.

"Faith, not I. This is my first visit, and I come from a long distance, too. I am from La Rochelle."

"From La Rochelle!" and the Red Hat in his turn regarded his new-found friend with perturbed looks; "what on earth brings you from thence?"

"The force of circumstances, my unlucky star, and his eminence, the cardinal. 'Tis a very long story. I have been specially sent for to wait upon his omiuence."

"Unfortunate man!" exclaimed the Red Hat; "what have you to do with him? Have you offended his eminence?"

"Never, to my knowledge," respond the burgess. "As fate would have it, however, I have been accused of doing so; but my complete justification can be neither long nor difficult. You must know that the Rochellois are very troublesome folks; and that evil-speaking, lying, and slandering are far too common there. Some scurvy wag among our citizens has written an anonymous satire against the administration in general, and Monseigueur the cardinal in particular. Then there has beeu a talk about Urbain Grandier, about tragedies and verses written by his eminence about a certain saraband said to have been danced by him before the queen; a pack of nonsense! Some secret enemy of mine has been good enough to denounce me as the author of these roguish pasquinades—I who never rhymed two lines together in my life. It is a most perverse and treacherous time. To exculpate myself, I referred to a certain worthy monk, Father Joseph, who is said to be honored with the friendship and confideuce of his eminence. He was fully convinced of my innocence; and subsequently informed me that Monseigneur would deign to grant me an interview; and here I am, deeply flattered by his eminence's condescension, although I should very much prefer being snug at home in my owu house at La Rochelle."

"Humph!" quoth the Red Hat; "for my part I think you would have done much better to have remained at home, aud left his fool's errand to take care of itself. Eminences are dangerous personages te have interviews with. But I must be going," he resumed, hastily rising "Farewell, master of miue! Thanks for your hospitality, and pray heaven and St. Nicholas that we may never meet again." And so saying, the Red Hat abruptly left the room.

"A fool's errand! what can he mean by that?" mused the burgess. "Poor man, he must be cracked. Who but a madman would think of wearing a red hat? However, my little affair will be soon settled—nine o'clock was the hour fixed at which I was to wait upon his eminence. 'Tis not five minutes walk to the chateau, and then I shall come comfortably home to bed.

Praying his reckoning at the polite request of the host, who hiuted that cavaliers who went up to the chateau sometimes fouud their arrangemeuts for returning at a fixed hour iuterfered with—a hint which the traveller wholly failed to comprehend—he went out into the night, wrapping his cloak around him to shelter himself from the still lalling snow.

He had not proceeded many paces along the sombre aveuue of poplars, before he thought that he heard the clinking of sword-blades and some smothered groans; he listeued attentively; but a sudden gust of wind came howling about him aud drowned the sound of the swords.

"It must have been fancy," he reasoned. "That confounded fellow with the red hat has made me nervous. If I were a coward, I should dream of him to-night."

"Help! murder!" suddenly cried a lamentable voice close to him.

"Courage, we are here!" cried the brave burgess drawing his sword and summing up all his presence of mind. "Hold on, we are four of us well armed! Ah! rascals, would you!" And he rushed forward in the direction wheuce the cries had come.

His ruse had seemingly succeeded, for in the obscurity he could dimly descry at least three men making off iu all haste, and anon he stumbled over a body lying on the ground. The moon came out for a moment through the murk, and he recognized, pale, bleeding, and groaning, the Red Hat. He seemed to be severely wounded. The burgess helped him to rise, but finding him too weak to walk, valorously hoisted him on his shoulders, and, not without difficulty, for the Red Hat weighed heavily, bore him back to the inn of the St. Nicholas. "This pestilent fellow with his red hat," he murmured, as, with the assistance of the landlord, he bore him up stairs and laid him in the bed which had been prepared for quite another purpose, "seems fated to be mixed up with my life. And I shall have to sleep in the arm-chair, forsooth; because he chooses to get waylaid and stabbed."

"Where am I?" faintly whispered the wounded man, when his wound had been bound up, and he had recovered consciousness.

"Among friends, brother," replied the honest burgess consolingly, as he bathed the temples of the sufferer with vinegar.

"Friends," repeated the Red Hat bitterly; "I have no friends! Who was at the trouble of saving the life of such a miserable wretch as I am?"

"Well, for that matter, 'twas I who picked you out of the mud, and set the rascals to flight who were besetting you. Three to one, the cowardly knaves! How they scampered! And then, you see, I brought you here pickaback; for walk a step you could not."

"And you—you then are my preserver!" the Red Hat exclaimed in a voice of agony, and pressing the burgess' hand.

"Yes, if you like to call it so. Wouldn't you have done the same for me?"

The innkeeper was down stairs. The wounded man made signs to the burgess to close the door securely, and come close to the bedside. Then he put his lips close to the burgess' ear, and in a hoarse whisper said :

"Had you not an appointment at nine o'clock with his eminence?"

"Of course I had, and I shall get a pretty scolding for being late. But perhaps the existence of a poor devil like me has slipped his eminence's memory?"

"Then," quoth the Red Hat, solemnly. "I can give life for life. You have saved mine. I too was bound to wait upon his eminence at nine to-night; and I have little doubt that it would have been my dreadful duty to strike your head from your body."

At this appalling intimation the Rochellois, with horror in his countenance, made for the door, thinking the Red Hat to be in a state of delirium; but the other called him back.

"'Tis not I, unfortunate, that thou must fly," he said. "Escape rather from this horrible neighborhood. Listen to what I say. The merciless cardinal has doubtless condemned you without a hearing; and it would have been my task to execute the sentence; for I—yes, I, whose hand you have pressed—I, whose life you have saved—I, who have eaten and drank with you—I am the most miserable, the most abandoned, the most accursed of mankind. I am the executioner of Chartres."

He paused for a moment, keenly eyeing his companion, who, brave and honest as he was, could not banish from his countenance the expression of repugnance he felt at being on familiar terms with the abhorred headsman.

"You may well shun me," continued the Red Hat, gloomily. "But fate has decreed that we must yet have some further communion before we part forever. Every time that his eminence has a deed of secret vengeance to consummate, I am summoned to the chateau. At this inn I always alight. The villagers know me and my red hat well, and shudderingly avoid me. They call this inn the House of the Headsman, and sometimes the Devil's Inn."

"I don't wonder at it," muttered the poor Rochellois.

"But fear nothing," continued the Red Hat; "although everything concurs to point out that you were the person I was sent for to execute, it may be some other victim who awaits my axe. Come, have your horse led forth. I must convey you to a place of safety."

"But you are wounded," urged the Rochellois.

"A mere scratch! With a draught of cordial I shall be strong and valid again. Strong enough," he continued, with his ugly smile, "for my work to-night, if work there be. Come, despatch!"

As, with many groans and murmurs, the lately wounded man arose, and the two left the chamber, they found the innkeeper on the staircase. He sought to give them the slip, and had evidently been listening to their conversation. The Red Hat was accustomed to act promptly. He seized the inkeeper by the throat, pinned him up in the angle of the stair, and whispered to him :

"Son of a dog and nephew of a sow! dare to speak one word concerning our conversation, and I denounce you to the Cardinal for harboring traitors, and your life is not worth an hour's purchase! Swear, issue of a mangy swine!"

The innkeeper, half-terrified out of his wits, swore as he was commanded; but the Red Hat kept his eyes sharply upon him till they were well clear of the Devil's Inn. There was need to employ every precaution, for the lower room was by this time full of a company of arquebusiers, the bodyguard of his eminence. The Red Hat watched the commandant of the band draw his host on one side, and apparently interrogate him; but his answers seemed perfectly satisfactory; and the two travellers were permitted to depart.

They started at a gallop, and were soon immersed in the forest of Butard, leading toward the Chateau of Ruel.

Suddenly the Red Hat reined-in his horse, and pointing out to his preserver the gloomy dwelling of the Cardinal, said:

"Mark well that little arched window with the grated bars before it. It can only be seen from the place where we now are. In that turret the dreadful decrees of Richelieu—the sentences from which there is no appeal—are executed. When my bloody task is accomplished, a trap-door opens, and a headless corpse falls a hundred feet into a vault filled with quick-lime. Every trace of the tragedy thus disappears. Remain here for an hour. Keep yourself concealed behind the trunk of this withered elm. If, during that hour, you see a light glimmering from that arched window, you may assure yourself that I have been summoned not on your account, but on that of some other unhappy victim. In that case you may present yourself without fear before his eminence, for it never happens that I am sent for to ply my hellish trade twice in the same night. But if during that hour the light does not appear, you are the destined victim—you are the victim waited for. Clap spurs to your horse, and make the best of your way to the frontier, or you will be captured; and the Lord have mercy on you!"

And so saying, and just interchanging one hearty grip with his friend the Red Hat rode away. The burgess of La Rochelle ever saw him again.

He waited an hour—a year it seemed to him—behind the the trunk of that withered elm; but no light appeared in the little arched window. He, then, was the wretch condemned to death. With a cold sweat bedewing him, and picturing to himself the arquebusiers of the terrible Cardinal scouring the country in every direction to bind him and lead him to the slaughter, he urged his horse into a gallop, and sped, as though the fiend who was said to be the patron of the inn of St. Nicholas were behind him, in the direction of the northern frontier. He could not quite convince himself that his head was safe upon his shoulders till he found himself, two days afterwards, at Huy in Flanders.

HINTS FOR THE SOUND AND THE SICK.

IF there be one thing more than another which it behooves a man to do—and there is no use in disguising the truth—it is to hold a tight reign over his disposition to indulge in stimulating drinks. Now, however well apparently a moderate indulgence in such potent liquids, port, sherry, toddy, and brandy-and-water may be borne by many during the colder months of the year, in the warmer ones the general use of such beverages is extremely noxious. During the former season, when every source of the development of animal heat is often advantageous to certain constitutions, and the preservation of the layer of fat beneath the skin is beneficial to all, a judicious employment of alcoholic liquids may be followed. But even then caution is necessary in the daily use of them as ordinary articles of diet. After a free addiction to spirituous fluids the blood in the arteries has been found to approach that of the veins, thus explaining the cases of suffocation observed in certain anomalous instances of the death of drunkards. The oxygen which alcohol absorbs in becoming converted into acetic acid and water, and afterwards carbonic acid and water, never arrives at the constituents of the blood. Upon the union of these with oxygen depends the transformation of venous into arterial blood, one of the most important conditions of the normal metamorphosis of tissue. We are fully aware of the very different views which have been taken of the changes undergone and influences produced by alcohol in the human body. But whether the theories of Liebig, Lehmann, Lallemand, Moleschott, and of others be followed, it matters not as to the point that men who, if not feeling the better, do not feel the worse, after the use of the strongest alcoholic beverages in winter, cannot, with anything like the same impunity, indulge in them during warm weather. The system, fired by the external warmth surrounding it on all sides, needs rather cooling than further excitement, and the irritable vascular and nervous systems demand toning down in lieu of being continuously goaded by stimulants to augmented action. There is something extremely refreshing to the jaded man of business, as well as to the idle man of pleasure, even in the thought of enjoying the iced champagne, glass of old port, chasse café of brandy at a fish dinner or a choice réunion. But what follows the reality? Need we recall to his mind how hot and sleepless he continued the night through; how his head ached in the morning; how little he could eat at breakfast; and how he wished the Crown and Sceptre at the bottom of the sea? Had this same sufferer taken only a glass or two of the lighter and sub-acid wines of the Rhone or the Rhine, enjoyed the coffee without the brandy, and have shunned the Roman punch as poison, how easily he could have said with the poet:

> "On morning wings, how lightly soars the mind
> That leaves the load of yesterday behind."

But, alas! the load he was so willing to put into his stomach sticks to him with malicious obstinacy perhaps for many a day.

Not only, however, as regards alcoholic drinks, but as respects solid food, must temperance be followed in warm weather. No man can then with impunity stuff his stomach with that amount of heavy meat and mixed diet he addicts himself to in winter. More vegetable matters, lighter articles generally, and less at a time, form the rule for midsummer, as opposed to that of Christmas. There are some bold men blessed with consciences and stomachs that will do anything—at least to the satisfaction of their owners. The naval captain who exclaimed, "Not eat that! I'll make my stomach submit to anything," formed the type of a larger class than was or is to be found simply on quarter-decks and at messtables. From the tropics to the poles, many men will eat and drink until they almost forget their humanity. Sir Ranald Martin tells us that an old staff officer in Fort William used to say that he had known more duels, courts-martial, and dismissals to result from the "tiffin" alone than from any other cause; but that what were the other results in the olden times of the tiffin and dinner together there is no man alive now-a-days to tell.—Lancet.

It is said that Ford's Theatre—the scene of President Lincoln's assassination—has been purchased by a society of Congregationalists, and will speedily be converted into a house of worship. It is also "said" that the Young Men's Christian Association have purchased the building.

LEISURE MOMENTS.

A man passes for what he is worth. Very idle is all curiosity concerning other people's estimate of us, and all fear of remaining unknown is not less so. If a man know that he can do anything—that he can do it better than any one else—he has a pledge of the acknowledgment of that fact by all persons. The world is full of judgment days, and into every assembly that a man enters, in every action he attempts, he is gauged and stamped. In every troop of boys that whoop and run in each yard and square, a new-comer is as well and accurately weighed in the course of a few days, and stamped with his right number, as if he had undergone a formal trial of his strength, speed and temper. A stranger comes from a distant school, with better dress, with trinkets in his pockets, with airs and pretensions: an older boy says to himself, "It's of no use; we shall find him out to-morrow." "What has he done?" is the divine question which searches men, and transpierces every false reputation. A fop may sit in any chair of the world, nor be distinguished, for his hour, from Homer and Washington; but there need never be any doubt concerning the respective ability of human beings. Pretension may sit still, but cannot act. Pretension never feigned an act of real greatness. Pretension never wrote an Iliad, nor drove back Xerxes, nor christianized the world, nor abolished slavery.—Spiritual Laws.

Chinvang the Chaste, ascending the throne of China, commanded that all who were unjustly detained in prison, during the preceding reigns, should be set free. Among the number who came to thank their deliverer on this occasion, there appeared a majestic old man, who, falling at the Emperor's feet, addressed him as follows: "Great father of China, behold a mortal now eighty-five years old, who was shut up in a dungeon at the age of twenty-two. I was imprisoned, though a stranger to crime, or without being even confronted by my accusers. I have now lived in solitude and darkness for more than fifty years, and am grown familiar with distress. As yet, dazzled with the splendor of that sun to which you have restored me, I have been wandering the streets to find out some friend that would assist or relieve or remember me; but my friends, my family, and relations are all dead and I am forgotten. Permit me, then, O Chinvang, to wear out the wretched remains of life in my former prison; the walls of my dungeon are to me more pleasing than the most splendid palace; I have not long to live, and shall be unhappy except I spend the rest of my days where my youth was passed—in that prison from whence you were pleased to release me."

Every Englishman is an embryonic Chancellor. His instinct is to search for a precedent. The favorite phrase of their land is: "A custom whereof the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary." The barons say, "Nolumus mutari;" and the cockneys stifle the curiosity of the foreigner on the reason of any practice, with "Lord, sir, it was always so." They hate innovation. Bacon told them "Time was the right reformer;" Chatham, that "Confidence was a plant of slow growth;" Canning, to "advance with the times;" and Wellington, that "habit was ten times nature." All their statesmen learn the irresistibility of the tide of custom, and have invented many fine phrases to cover this slowness of perception and prehensility of tail.—English Traits.

Of all English philosophers, I most reverence Bacon, that great and hardy genius. He it is who, undaunted by the seeming difficulties that oppose, prompts human curiosity to examine every part of nature, and even exhorts man to try whether he cannot subject the tempest, the thunder and even earthquakes to human control. Oh, had a man of his daring spirit, of his genius, penetration and learning, travelled to those countries which have been visited only by the superstitious and mercenary, what might not mankind have effected! How would he enlighten the regions to which he travelled! and what a variety of knowledge and useful improvement would he bring back in exchange!—Goldsmith.

At the murder of the Duke d'Enghien the royal victim, looking at the soldiers who had pointed their fusees, said: "Grenadiers! lower your arms: otherwise you will miss or only wound me." To two of them who proposed to tie a handkerchief over his eyes, he said; "A loyal soldier who has been so often exposed to fire and sword, can see the approach of death with naked eyes and without fear."—D'Israeli.

"Good news, Belhoul," said a wag at Bokara, "the Caliph has appointed you governor of all the apes and dogs in the kingdom." "Prepare, then," said Belhoul, "to obey my commands."

Men are sometimes accused of pride, merely because their accusers would be proud themselves if they were in their places.

The records of the Libby Prison, with the names, regiments, date of capture, etc., of every Federal officer and private that ever passed the doors of that prison, have been sent to Washington. The whole number of prisoners there since the war, in round numbers, is 125,000.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865.

AFTER-DINNER SPEECHES.*

ON examiuation of the sociality of the Pacific coast Alumni as it stands crystallized in the verbatim report of the post prandial eloquence displayed at table, we cannot help feeling that many of the speechmakers labored under an oppressive sense of a necessity, on their part, to glitter intellectually. Perhaps it was owing to the fact that various and rival colleges being represented, each alumnus instinctively put his best foot forward for the honor of his own alma mater. At all events, there is an earnest reaching after oratory, which ill befits an assembly of old boys called together to do honor to callow reminiscences of their own and others' youth.

There is danger to political reputation hidden in these Alumni meetings. We earnestly advise politicians who hanker after the wages of prudence, to refrain from letting themselves out at similar gatherings. Witness the unfortunate handle which Mr. Felton fashioned for inimical hands by his oration last year.

The chairman at the "festival," Edward Tompkins, Esq., appears to have worked the oratorical crank con amore. He seems to have acted very much like a Methodist class-leader stirring up a revival. Not only did he inaugurate the toasting with a spread-eagle effort; but made little speeches, discursory, complimentary and witty, between times. Indeed, seeming to appreciate the absence of any such breathing spells as are ordinarily employed in sipping grape juice, he supplies the deficiency by giving us the effervescent Tompkins. In fact, the entire performance smacks very much like almond candy; and Tompkins may be compared to the crystallized sugar, while the other orators afford the relieving effect of the kernels embedded therein.

The Rev. Mr. Brown of Newark, New Jersey, responded to the sentiment, "Our country." The reverend speaker commenced his speech by a slightly disparaging allusion to the California strawberry, which formed the staple of the material side of the entertainment. We notice, indeed, that there is a hungry and thirsty tinge to the entire festival, which no flow of soul can efface. A touch of cuisine might go far to improve the tone of the assembled educated abilities of our coast. The orator finally expanded into patriotism, and closed with a warm eulogy of the two Commissions, Sanitary and Christian.

Messrs. Washburn and Rankin spoke for San Francisco, and were followed by General McDowell for the army. We had occasion some weeks ago to quote what we understood the commander to say in opening his speech. We may then have quoted correctly, and the objectional insinuations may have since been removed. As the report stands, the General said:

"When I was about coming here to-day, a pert young gentleman with whom I walked, asked me if I was an Alumnus? [Shouts of laughter.] In view of the representatives I see here of the colleges of the Eastern States, of the Pacific, the Mississippi and the Lake States, and in view of the humble pretensions, or rather no pretensions at all, the school on the banks of the Hudson makes to any thing literary, I could not but feel there was a good deal of propriety in his question." [Laughter.]

We stand convicted of simple stupidity in a late article headed "Military Weaknesses," if the above were the words used.

General Wilson made a desultory, genial sort of speech, the only real Alumni-meeting effort we find. The distinguished professor Jackson followed with an exposition of the triumphs of Science, which was full of happy illustrations and touches of finely wrought eloquence that fully demonstrated that a savan need not necessarily be what the French diplomatist asserted, "one who knew everything that nobody else knew and nothing that everybody else knew." The professor appeared to understand the art of talking without exciting ennui; and we only wish that he would give San Francisco the pleasure of hearing him discuss popularly some of his favorite studies.

Judge Shafter, in response to "The Judiciary," made remarks that betrayed scholarship, rendered pliable and graceful by long contact with the professional world. He described what the institution at Oakland was intended to teach, and vouched for the unblemished patriotism and Christianity of its teachings.

Mr. John W. Dwinelle was witty in behalf of the dead languages.

A number of clergymen followed, humorous, religious and ethical. Then came the College Vice President, who, of course, urged the claims of the new college. He was followed by Joseph W. Winans, Esq., on behalf of the pioneers of California. This gentleman's speech was very eloquent, but it sounded a little like a rehash of some old brief in a pioneer land case, though our suspicion may be erring. A few more reverend gentlemen follow, and then comes Dr. Gibbons, who is thrown into such good company by reason of his religious air. He was witty, as were also Mr. Livingston, on behalf of the "Press," and the Rev. J. E. Benton for the Ladies. The last named gentleman announced that it was time to go to the boat. The indefatigable chairman got off a final speech; and our record closes.

We trust that next year, the Alumni will not sacrifice so much to jejuneness in the matter of eating and drinking, and to that end we recommend a reading of the famous college song by that renowned old baccalaureus, Walter Mapes, arch deacon of Oxford:

"Mihi est propositum in taberna mori."

THE ALUMNI POEM.*

FOR refinement, chaste scholarship and breadth of handling, Mr. Sills' poem surpasses any Californian metrical performance we have as yet been fortunate enough to meet. Yet it is too much to expect that in its present form it will meet an audience as appreciative as the one for whom it was originally prepared. It seems scarcely fair to transplant a work of this culture from the cloistered and meditative gloom of what our poet has prettily termed the ——"Cathedral roof of elm Frescoed with flickering sunlight," into the sharp sunlight of the open square, where, as we are told in the old fable, these things must eventually come for final judgment. It does not seem exactly right to submit transcendentalism to the criticism of believers in x and y, and yet it is to this very audience that our young poet's charming philosophy is now offered. No doubt it will be subjected to criticism that will be flippant and unfair. Many will abuse it because they don't understand it—many will praise it for the same reason. The fault of most of these scholastic performances—and a fault from which Mr. Sills is not exempt—is the comfortable recognition of a certain intellectual freemasonry existing among educated men, which having its own signs and passwords, is therefore cut off from the sympathies of the outside world. The great fact that the gods speak in the same tongue with mankind as with gods, is forgotten, as is also the fact that in proportion as we come nearer to the broad truths which influence mankind, we leave behind our letters and symbols. But your Alumnus is nothing without his formulæ. Hence the following:

"Who are we,
Clustered to-day with eyes and hands that clasp
As by some secret oath of brotherhood,
Out of the mass that jostles to and fro
Forever, without aim or hope? We are pledged
To UNDERSTAND, to live the truth we know,
And help men so to live and understand.
A handful 'gainst a host, we make our stand,
Nailing this thesis on the golden gate
Of the new Mammon-temples—that the souls—
The striving, praying, hoping, human souls—
Alone on earth are valuable—their end
To will God's will, because their will belongs
To him, the maker and the giver, so
Dilating to the broader destiny
Whose shadowy gateway opens from our world."

We could have wished, for the better comprehensiveness of this passage, that the poet had extorted from everybody a pledge "to UNDERSTAND" similar to that obtained from the brotherhood to whom these remarkable powers are given. We confess that we are at a loss to know what Mr. Sills means by a company clustered "with eyes and hands that clasp, etc." The nearest approach to a license of this kind is the zeugma, which although classical and authorized by Virgil, and of course understood by the brotherhood alluded to, is nevertheless vulnerable to outside criticism. But Mr. Sills is inclined, if we may so express ourselves, to "go back" on his alma mater. He asks:

"What is our training—what do colleges give
To men, which makes that feared and sneered at thing,
A culture through the classics? Do we dare
Reveal the Eleusinian mysteries
Which leave such impress on these white boy-brows,
That the world, recognizing kingship, says,
'Here is a soul that knows itself, who has touched
The centre, and radiates the broadening beams
Of influence straight to the point he means?'
We cannot, if we would, tell all; we hold
Some things there are that never can be told."

Now the outside world might reasonably answer that a culture through the classics is by no means a feared or sneered-at thing, nor is "kingship" on the other hand invariably recognized on these "white boy-brows." An undue importance is given to formulæ and symbols, even in Mr. Sills' generous intention to be liberal, and in the following opening sentence there is an equally unpleasant suggestion of text books:

"A small, swift planet, glimmering round a star—
A molten drop with thinnest crusted shell
Of lime and flint, roofed-in with azure air—
A winding stair of life, from Trilobite
And Saurian up to one who walks their king,
Drawing the lime and flint up through themselves
And kindling them to spirit, till on him,
Whose limbs are clay, there flames a lambent crown
Of fire from heaven—these make our world."

Admirable and concise as is this materialistic history of the world, we are a little pained to find that after all it is only given as a sort of pedigree of the perfect "Alumnus," who makes his appearance a few lines further on, as the finishing creation.

But while we object to these college conventionalisms, and confess that we may be reasonably classed with the "brisk and dapper minds" which have had "the practical but not the philosophic training," we are nevertheless able to appreciate the beauty of conceit and imagery which, like "orient pearls at random strung," are scattered through the poem. The following similitude, as applied to a tree, strikes us as being as original as it is delicate and beautiful:

"The gnarled limbs spring upward airy-free,
And from their perfect arch they scarcely swerve.
Like spouted fountains from a dark, green sea
So beautiful they curve—
Motionless fountains, slumbering in mid-air,
With spray of shadows falling everywhere."

And again:

"The wind comes hushing, hushing through the trees
Like surf that breaks on an invisible beach
And sends a spray of whispers down the breeze."

And this description of California:

"In this fair land, whose fields lie robed in bloom,
A living poem bound in blue and gold,
With azure flowers like little flecks of sky
Fallen, tangled in the dew-drops, to the grass,
And orange ones—as if the wealth below
Had blossomed up in heaten flakes of gold:
Where all the baser elements of earth,
Aspiring up through root, and stalk, and leaf,
Poised on their slender feet for flying; here
Nature, like amorous Cleopatra, plots
To hold her Cæsar, brimming every sense
With perfume, song, and gorgeous coloring,
Throws softly-wooing winds about his neck,
With sparkling air (as though not pearls alone,
But diamonds were dissolved in it,) still fires
His brain to seek new dalliance, fresh delight,
Forgetful of his throne beyond the sea."

Or, as a relief to the mere beauty of these fancies, there is much truth and masculine force in the following:

"So
All men, even these, have uses. Some to go
Whirling around the swift circumference,
Spinning out sparks into the darkling space,
While some sit staidly at the safe, slow hub,
And swear there are no radii, and no rim,
No winged steeds far at the chariot's pole,
No Power that rides, triumphant, terrible."

"Sophomores,
And parvenus of the intellectual world!
Who would brush down from heaven the olden stars,
To set new, self-adjusting spangles there,
Would mow the everlasting mountains off,
And build up straight, right-angled ones instead."

We might offer other felicities of thought and expression, but we could not fairly quote them without their philosophical context, which to the general reader might spoil the effect. "The world," says Mr Emerson, "being put under the mind for verb and noun, the poet is he who can articulate it." In this sense Mr. Sills has certainly used the world, and quite as Mr. Emerson is in the habit of using it. If Mr. Sills' poetry is too transcendental, intellectual and philosophical for the average reader, it is nevertheless to be preferred to the ultra-sentimental, from which, judging from the quality of the original poems published in California, our young civilization stands in great peril. Those portions of the Alumni poem which can be understood by the honest miner, offer—even at these rare and uncertain intervals—a healthier and more nutritious pabulum than can be found in the sentimental rhymes which are the dessert offered by daily and weekly journals.

MISS KING'S READINGS.—The second reading from the Poets by Miss Angela S. King, on Tuesday evening, was very well attended. On Wednesday evening, she drew a large audience at San Jose. To-night she will give another reading at the Academy of Music, and on Tuesday, August 1st, she will read at Sacramento. She has thus far achieved a success, remarkable for the season and for a literary entertainment which has seldom attained much popularity.

THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELISTS.

[Anxious to keep up the literary standard of The Californian, its proprietors have, at an enormous expense, recently engaged the principal novelists of Europe and America to contribute to its columns. In view of the objections sometimes offered to "Only a Clod" and other continued tales, arrangements have been made with the different authors to condense their stories into a space that shall not exceed two columns of our paper. By this means The Californian will be enabled to offer its readers a three-volume novel in a single issue, or so to speak, a seventy-five cent book for ten cents. By the last steamer, we have received our fourth installment, from the pen of a voluminous writer, which we give below:]

THE NINETY-NINE GUARDSMEN.

BY AL-X—D-E D-M-S.

CHAPTER I.

SHOWING THE QUALITY OF THE CUSTOMERS OF THE INKEEPER OF PROVINS.

TWENTY years after, the gigantic innkeeper of Provins stood looking at a cloud of dust on the highway.

This cloud of dust betokened the approach of a traveller. Travellers had been rare that season on the highway between Paris and Provins.

The heart of the innkeeper rejoiced. Turning to Dame Perigord, his wife, he said, stroking his white apron:

"St. Denis! make haste and spread the cloth. Add a bottle of Chaloix to the table. This traveller, who rides so fast, by his pace must be a Monseigneur.

Truly the traveller, clad in the uniform of a musketeer, as he drew up to the door of the hostelry, did not seem to have spared his horse. Throwing his reins to the landlord, he leaped lightly to the ground. He was a young man of four and twenty, and spoke with a slight Gascon accent.

"I am hungry, Morbleu! I wish to dine!"

The gigantic innkeeper bowed and led the way to a neat apartment, where a table stood covered with tempting viands. The musketeer at once set to work. Fowls, fish and patés disappeared before him. Perigord sighed as she witnessed the devastations. Only once the stranger paused.

"Wine!" Perigord brought wine. The stranger drank a dozen bottles. Finally he rose to depart. Turning to the expectant landlord, he said:

"Charge it."

"To whom, your highness?" said Perigord, anxiously.

"To his Eminence!"

"Mazarin!" ejaculated the innkeeper.

"The same. Bring me my horse," and the musketeer, remounting his favorite animal, rode away.

The innkeeper slowly turned back into the inn. Scarcely had he reached the court-yard, before the clatter of hoofs again called him to the doorway. A young musketeer of a light and graceful figure, rode up.

"Parbleu, my dear Perigord, I am famishing. What have you got for dinner."

"Venison, capons, larks and pigeons, your excellency," replied the obsequious landlord, bowing to the ground.

"Enough!" The young musketeer dismounted and entered the inn. Seating himself at the table replenished by the careful Perigord, he speedily swept it as clean as the first comer.

"Some wine, my brave Perigord," said the graceful young musketeer as soon as he could find utterance.

Perigord brought three dozen of Chaloix. The young man emptied them almost at a draught. "By-by, Perigord," he said lightly, waving his hand, as, preceding the astonished landlord, he slowly withdrew.

"But, your highness—the bill"—said the astounded Perigord.

"Ah, the bill. Charge it!"

"To whom?"

"The Queen!"

"What, Madame?"

"The same. Adieu my good Perigord," and the graceful stranger rode away. An interval of quiet succeeded, in which the innkeeper gazed woefully at his wife. Suddenly he was startled by a clatter of hoofs, and an aristocratic figure stood in the doorway.

"Ah," said the courtier good naturedly. "What, do my eyes deceive me? No, it is the festive and luxurious Perigord. Perigord, listeu. I famish. I languish. I would dine."

The innkeeper again covered the table with viands. Again it was swept clean as the fields of Egypt before the miraculous swarm of locusts. The stranger looked up.

"Bring me another fowl, my Perigord."

"Impossible, your excellency, the larder is stripped clean."

"Another fletch of bacon, then."

"Impossible, your highness—there is no more."

"Well, then, wine!"

The landlord brought one hundred and forty-four bottles. The courtier drank them all.

"One may drink if one cannot eat," said the aristocratic stranger, good-humoredly.

The innkeeper shuddered.

The guest rose to depart. The innkeeper came slowly forward with his bill, to which he had covertly added the losses which he had suffered from the previous strangers.

"Ah! the bill—charge it."

"Charge it! to whom?"

"To the King," said the guest.

"What! his Majesty?"

"Certainly. Farewell, Perigord."

The innkeeper groaned. Then he went out and took down his sign. Then remarked to his wife:

"I am a plain man, and don't understand politics. It seems, however, that the country is in a troubled state. Between his Eminence the Cardinal, his Majesty the King, and her Majesty the Queen, I am a ruined man."

"Stay," said Dame Perigord, "I have an idea."

"And that is—"

"Become yourself a musketeer."

CHAPTER II.

THE COMBAT.

On leaving Provins the first musketeer proceeded to Nangis, where he was reinforced by thirty-three followers. The second musketeer, arriving at Nangis at the same moment, placed himself at the head of thirty-three more. The third guest of the Landlord of Provins arrived at Nangis in time to assemble together thirty-three other musketeers.

The first stranger led the troops of his Eminence.

The second led the troops of the Queen.

The third led the troops of the King.

The fight commenced. It raged terribly for seven hours. The first musketeer killed thirty of the Queen's troops. The second muskoteer killed thirty of the King's troops. The third musketeer killed thirty of his Eminence's troops.

By this time it will be perceived the number of musketeers had been narrowed down to four on each side.

Naturally the three principal warriors approached each other.

They simultaneously uttered a cry:

"Aramis!"

"Athos!"

"D'Artagnan!"

They fell into each other's arms.

"And it seems that we are fighting against each other, my children," said the Count de la Fere, mournfully.

"How singular!" exclaimed Aramis and D'Artagnan.

"Let us stop this fratricidal warfare," said Athos.

"We will!" they exclaimed together.

"But how to disband our followers?" queried D'Artagnan.

Aramis winked. They understood each other. "Let us cut 'em down!"

They cut 'em down. Aramis killed three. D'Artagnan three. Athos three.

The friends again embraced. "How like old times," said Aramis. "How touching!" exclaimed the serious and philosophical Count de la Fere.

The galloping of hoofs caused them to withdraw from each other's embraces. A gigantic figure rapidly approached.

"The Innkeeper of Provins!" they cried, drawing their swords.

"Perigord, down with him!" shouted D'Artagnan.

"Stay," said Athos.

The gigantic figure was beside them. He uttered a cry.

"Athos, Aramis, D'Artagnan!"

"Porthos!" exclaimed the astonished trio.

"The same." They all fell in each other's arms.

The Count de la Fere slowly raised his hands to Heaven. "Bless you! Bless us, my children! However different our opinion may be in regard to politics, we have but one opinion in regard to our own merits. Where can you find a better man than Aramis?"

"Than Porthos," said Aramis.

"Than D'Artagnan," said Porthos.

"Than Athos," said D'Artagnan.

CHAPTER III.

SHOWING HOW THE KING OF FRANCE WENT UP A LADDER.

The King descended into the garden. Proceeding cautiously along the terraced walk, he came to the wall immediately below the windows of Madame. To the left were two windows, concealed by vines. They opened into the apartments of La Valliere.

The King sighed.

"It is about nineteen feet to that window," said the King. "If I had a ladder nineteen feet long, it would reach to that window. This is logic."

Suddenly the King stumbled over something. "St. Denis!" he exclaimed, looking down. It was a ladder, just nineteen feet long.

The King placed it against the wall. In so doing, he fixed the lower end upon the abdomen of a man who lay concealed by the wall. The man did not utter a cry or wince. The King suspected nothing. He ascended the ladder.

The ladder was too short. Louis the Grand was not a tall man. He was still two feet below the window.

"Dear me!" said the King.

Suddenly the ladder was lifted two feet from below. This enabled the King to leap in the window. At the further end of the apartment, stood a young girl, with red hair and a lame leg. She was trembling with emotion.

"Louise!"

"The King!"

"Ah, my God, mademoiselle."

"Ah, my God, sire."

But a low knock at the door, interrupted the lovers. The King uttered a cry of rage; Louise one of despair.

The door opened and D'Artagnan entered.

"Good evening, sire," said the musketeer.

The King touched a bell. Porthos appeared in the doorway.

"Good evening, sire."

"Arrest M. D'Artagnan."

Porthos looked at D'Artagnan, and did not move.

The King almost turned purple with rage. He again touched the bell. Athos entered.

"Count, arrest Porthos and D'Artagnan."

The Count de la Fere glanced at Porthos and D'Artagnan, and smiled sweetly.

"Sacre! Where is Aramis?" said the King, violently.

"Here, sire." and Aramis entered.

"Arrest Athos, Porthos and D'Artagnan."

Aramis bowed and folded his arms.

"Arrest yourself!"

Aramis did not move.

The King shuddered and turned pale. "Am I not King of France?"

"Assuredly sire, but we are also severally, Porthos, Aramis, D'Artagnan, and Athos."

"Ah!" said the King.

"Yes, sire."

"What does this mean?"

"It means, your majesty," said Aramis stepping forward, "that your conduct as a married man is highly improper. I am an Abbe, and I object to these improprieties. My friends here, D'Artagnan, Athos and Porthos, pure-minded young men, are also terribly shocked. Observe, sire, how they blush!"

Athos, Porthos and D'Artagnan blushed.

"Ah," said the King, thoughtfully. You teach me a lesson. You are devoted and noble young gentlemen, but your only weakness is your excessive modesty. From this moment I make you all Marshals and Dukes, with the exception of Aramis."

"And me, sire?" said Aramis.

"You shall be an Archbishop!"

The four friends looked up and then rushed into each others arms. The King embraced Louise de la Valliere, by way of keeping them company. A pause ensued. At last Athos spoke:

"Swear my children, that next to yourselves, you will respect—the King of France; and remember that 'Forty years after' we will meet again."

THE END.

A NEW WEAPON.

WE are aware that the spittoon has to some extent mingled with American politics. It is an undeniable fact that, as a social adjunct, it has subjected us to the sarcasm of foreigners, and that it has been considered an useful auxiliary to the caucus and convention. But it has been reserved for the ingenuous gentlemen who have undertaken the control of our political affairs at Sacramento, to give it a direct influence in the convention, and to show how this peaceful vessel may be converted into a vessel of wrath, and how the receptacle of mutual and harmonious expectoration may be used as a deadly missile. In the words of the reporter, during the melée: "Spittoons flew from side to side like bombshells on the battlefield."

As a literary journal, having no interest in purely local politics, and occupying a neutral position, we have refrained from expressing any opinion on the Senatorial canvass, and have passed by without comment much that was foul and infamous in its conduct. But we must here enter a protest against the introduction of a spittoon in this form into the primaries. We base our objections on purely asthetic grounds. A spittoon is as difficult to handle in verse or heroic recital as we imagine it would be as a weapon. The Sacramento Iliad must remain unsung; the fall of Kavanaugh, who may have dropped like Achilles at the Scæan gate, must go unrecorded. We have put up with a good deal. We have borne the slang of "Short Hairs" and "Long Hairs," we have winked at the spectacle of high officials paddling in the dirty pool; we have patiently submitted to the lowest kind of political corruption, but we can't stand this. We have accepted the spittoon in every other form but that of a deadly missile.

We call upon the Senatorial candidates to discountenance at once this new use of a familiar formula. The bandying of epithets may be substituted instead, and may be made in skillful hands to convey as much that is objectionable. In unskillful hands it will be seen that spittoon-throwing may degenerate into mere incivility and discourtesy. Although the end might have justified the means in the late skirmish at Sacramento, we should have preferred that other weapons had been employed to effect the object. Chairs seemed to have contributed largely to the offensive material of the combatants, and inkstands "took the place of solid shot." We can only deplore that in this latest Senatorial conflict there had not been more inkstands used and less spittoons.

WINTER IN NEW ENGLAND.

THE winter of New England is simply glorious. Announced by the trumpets of November winds, King Frost comes with his glittering coronet, carves his throne of snow-pure crystal, and is for his months monarch of all he surveys. There snow is not that mixture of mud and slush found in other regions. It is a great white mantle which, whilst it nourishes the seeds of harvests by its great warmth —"He scattereth his snow like wool"—furnishes to the thousands of sledges roads upon which they may travel with a railway swiftness to every part of the country. At times, indeed, the snow hardens on top to ice, and one may skate across fields for many miles. So exquisitely beautiful are the snow-scenes of Massachusetts, that they have given rise to a literature of their own. The old divines preached about the snow; the historians have recorded instances of singular phenomena and effects of great snows upon animals; and nearly every poet has sung its glories. The snow-poetry of New England would make a fine volume. Many will remember Emerson's charming "Snowstorm," in which the words sparkle like the frost-crystals they transfigure:

> "Out of an unseen quarry evermore
> Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer
> Carves his white bastions with projected roof
> Round every windward stake, or tree, or door.
> Speeding, the myriad-handed, his wild work
> So fanciful, so savage, nought cares he
> For number or proportion. Mockingly,
> On coop or kennel he hangs Parian wreaths;
> A swan-like form invests the hidden thorn;
> Fills up the farmer's lane from wall to wall,
> Maugre the farmer sighs; and, at the gate,
> A tapering turret overtops the work.
> And when his hours are numbered, and the world
> Is all his own, retiring, as he were not,
> Leaves, when the sun appears, astonished Art
> To mimic in slow structures, stone by stone,
> Built in an age, the mad wind's night-work,
> The frolic architecture of the snow."

Occasionally there are frost-phenomena in Massachusetts, which are not only of surpassing beauty, but deserving of consideration among men of science. Early in the morning of a winter's day, in 1861, I went out to skate on the Musketaquid, and found every object covered by a crystal moss or ivy. Every fence, log, and dead grass-blade was transmuted to silver, and each bush and tree was covered with a frost-foliage, answering to, and, I thought, shaped like its appropriate summer-dress. Such foliation as one often sees upon frosty window-panes here stood out carved into erect and distinct forms. Coraline growths and tiny ice-blossoms were wrought in bas-relief on the very mud. But when I reached the river what a scene met my eye! The ice was a greenish claret in color, and upon this were scattered, as by some elfin troop, a myriad of pure white frost-flowers, about as large as roses, but copying in their structure the water-lilies which adorn the river in the summer months. These crystals were all of nearly the same size, and arranged at regular intervals upon the ice—about one to the square foot—for miles. When my skate touched one, it turned to the faintest powder, with a little tinkling sound. These were not the results of the action of frost on snow, for no snow had fallen since the freezing over of the river. When the sun rose, it was as if the winter-fairies had been surprised at their work; for a half-hour the world was glorified; all things rose to a splendid transformation scene, with pendant wreaths of richest gems glancing opalescent fires; and then the pageant was ended. The pantomimes which amuse the English in the Christmas season are not known in America; but any manager would make his fortune who could introduce here such scenes as by night and day may be seen upon those rivers and ponds. Old King Frost is a jolly old king; he calls out his troops of ice-maidens, his harlequins and columbines, who, lightly equipped, and in brilliant costumes, glide like spirits of the winds on their skates, and make a firmament of constellations for the fishes beneath. These girls have evidently never been trained to think themselves disgraced by having legs, and Nature has rewarded their confidence by giving them such as Atalanta might covet. They can hold their own with the best male skater in the company. New York and Boston encountered each other in a ladies' skating-match, I am told, and "the belt" was won and worn by the Bostonian. These skating parties are kept up far into the night; on the shores are large fires to keep spectators warm and give radiance to the scene; and no blue or red lights ever illuminated so finely such brilliant spectacles. Ah! for earth's deep delight give me above all other things a fresh start on the ice, of a clear morning, with a bevy of Massachusetts maids and young men—a start with rations in our pockets, a path of crystal all the way to the ocean, no past, no tyrannous dinner-hour behind us, infinite space and eternity before us!—Fraser's Magazine.

THIRTY buildings—nearly all the business portions of Brantfort, C. W.—were destroyed by fire June 14th. The property is estimated to be worth from $100,000 to $125,000. Insured for $50,500. The fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

GARIBALDI'S WIFE.

THE story of Garibaldi's wooing is this: He was one day sitting in the cabin of a sloop on the lake of Santa Catharina, and looking toward the shore, when suddenly he saw, at a farm-house situated on a neighboring hill, three or four girls busily engaged in domestic duties. They were all remarkable for beauty, but one in particular arrested his attention for her uncommon grace and loveliness.

He was still watching them when he received an order to go on shore. Immediately on landing, he directed his steps to the house. He was admitted by the owner, whom he happened to know slightly, having met him once before.

The impulse which had prompted him to go to the house was to address the girl he had so admired. On seeing her, he immediately besought her to become his wife. The girl, it seems, conceived an affection as warm and sudden as he had felt for her; and after the lapse of a few short days they were man and wife.

The surname of this lovely Brazilian girl of the province of Santa Catharina, who became, under such peculiarly romantic circumstances, the wife of Garibaldi, has never been revealed. In all the biographies of our hero she is alone mentioned by her Christian name of Amita. She seems to have been a brunette of a rich, warm complexion, with black and piercing eyes; of a beautifully rounded figure, and a sort of queenly majesty of deportment; active, daring, high spirited and in every respect worthy of being the companion for life of such a man as Garibaldi.

Her courage was remarkable. A short time after their marriage she went through an engagement at sea, with her husband, refusing to go ashore, and during the fight would stay nowhere but on deck, where she wielded a carbine and cheered the men. In the heat of the battle she was standing on deck, flourishing a sabre, and inspiring the men to deeds of valor, when she was knocked down by the wind of a cannon-ball that had killed two men standing close by her side. Garibaldi was springing forward to her, thinking that he would find her a corpse, when she rose to her feet, covered with the blood of the men who had fallen close to her, but quite unhurt. He begged her to go below and remain there until the action was over.

"I will go below," was her reply, "but only to drive out the sneaking cowards who are skulking there;" for only a few seconds before, she had seen three men leave the deck and hurry rapidly down the hatchway, so as to escape out of danger of the storm of bullets that was sweeping the deck. And going below, she immediately after re-appeared, driving before her the three men, overcome with shame that they should have been surpassed in courage by a woman.

She accompanied her husband in all his undertakings, and died while flying with him from the Austrians.

AN ALABASTER CAVE.—For one-third of a mile the stream was covered with a huge pile of snow. I crossed to the upper part of this with my Esquimaux boy, and went down the stream itself to slake my thirst. I kneeled down and drank of the sparkling waters. As I looked around before rising—what did I see? A cave of alabaster! snow arches, numberless and incomparable. At a point where several arches commenced to spring were pendant finely-formed icicles, from which poured, perpendicular to the earth, unbroken streams of water, having the appearance of inverted columns of crystal, supporting the arches. The number of these columns was great. Away, far down the cave through which the stream passed, all was dark—dark as Cimmerian darkness. From this I turned my eyes upward. Overhanging my head were pinnacled mountains 1,000 feet above me. Far as the eye could reach they extended. On my still bending knees I thanked God that I lived to behold how manifold and wonderful was the world's creation. None but God and the untutored Esquimaux saw me there, amid the roar of that mountain waterfall, offering up this, my heart's prayer. Life with the Esquimaux, by C. F. Hall.

A NEW-MOON CEREMONY IN AFRICA.—We were asked to witness a new-moon ceremony. This generally takes place three days after the first appearance of the luminary, and it was celebrated as usual by our men firing volleys in the air. The Sultan assumes priestly garb and dons his long false white beard on this occasion. His whole body remains concealed behind a screen, and he has beside him his insignia of office, either a small drum or an instrument which no one but himself can arise. The drums, generally thirty-three, are on the ground in a line, each having a large white cross on its head—a strange Crusader-like custom. A man stands behind each, and the leader, with two small drums, is in front to give the time. On his raising the right arm, the thirty-three drummers do the same, then the left arm, and they gradually beat the drums quicker, till ending in a tremendous roll. This continues for three hours, with intervals, and is repeated the day following. A band of drums is near the Sultan's hut, giving lighter dance music for the amusement of the boys and girls, who must make merry as the new-moon term comes around.—Grant's Travels in Africa.

A PHOTOGRAPH.—In Venice, says George Augustus Sala, the gondola is the unique and invariable maritime craft to be met with. Men and women go to be married, and the dead are carried to be buried, in gondolas. You shall see one gondola full of garden stuff, and another piled up with butcher's meat. In one, a carpenter's bench is set up, and the carpenter is sawing or planing away, while his shavings or his sawdust are blown overboard into the canal, and drift away with the tide. The very beggars have gondolas, and cripples propel themselves with the oar between their stumps, asking in the soft and musical Venetian dialect, for alms as they row past you. The bricklayers' laborers row to their work, and the washerwomen ply their vocation in gondolas. Artists sketching in them you may often see; likewise women at needlework, and children at play, and notaries' clerks copying crabbed deeds. They are cleanly and isolated congeners of the sampans in the Chinese waters. Finally, as far as my late at-night experience extends, the gondoliers appear to sleep in their boats, and to have and to desire no other domicile. There are said to be as many gondolas in Venice as there are droschkies in St. Petersburg—nearly four thousand; but their chief traffic is on the Grand Canal and its tributary arteries. The great throng of gondolas ceases at the Molo, where they are moored close and thick together at night two or three tiers deep. For a mile or more from this point, barges and boats of every form, schooners and feluccas, speronares and brigantines, with lateen sails, and queer images of saints and madonnas emblazoned on them or painted on their sterns and prows, lie at anchor in ranks of tolerable density. There is no forest of masts, and never will be again at Venice, I fear; but there is a pretty shrubbery of spars, and much gracefully-branching rigging. Here and there, too, at some distance from the quay, you see anchored a passenger boat that plies between Venice or Fiume, or Chioggia, or even Trieste and Dalmatian littoral. It is only vessels drawing less than seven feet of water that can come up so far. At the Guidecca, the maritime element assumes a coarser and less picturesque form. Tar, tarpaulin and oakum assert themselves. Heavy-beamed Austrian sailors poison the air with the fumes of the vilest tobacco; ship-chandleries, marine stores, and grog-shops abound; and the spectacle of a tipsy mariner—English, American or German—is not by any means uncommon. The seafaring Italians, however, whatever may be their other faults, such as hugging the shore too close, trusting more to the intercession of saints in the science of navigation than to the shipman's card, going to sleep whenever they have an opportunity, and passing the major portion of their wakeful moments in gambling, are strictly temperate. They can drink their cool draught of vino nero, their rosolio, or their thimbleful of aniseed; but of intoxication they seem to have an utter and innate abhorrence. In fact, a drunken man in Venice seems to be as great a rarity as a horse; and the sober inhabitants, were they to get hold of a confirmed toper, would, I fancy, be so much puzzled to know what to do with him, that it is not improbable they might bring their doubts to a solution by flinging him into the canal.

INTERESTING PHYSIOLOGICAL FACTS.—In a letter to the London Globe, Dr. Kidd mentions the following instance of the restoration of sight in a young woman born blind. He says: "I saw individually and observed with interest, the following case a short time ago at the Eye Institution, Moorfields—a case that would be invaluable to Berkley, as bearing on the part played by the senses in intellect, etc. A very interesting looking young woman, twenty-two years of age, born stone blind—partly educated in the family of a clergyman, all this time by finger alphabets, as we see blind men tracing the letters in one or two places in town—blind for twenty-two years, was restored to perfect vision in four days by a surgical operation, and to partial vision in two minutes. This young woman, in an instant, having been twenty-two years and from her birth stone-blind of congenital cataract, began to see, as those deaf mutes in Paris began to hear for the first time. The effect in the young woman was most curious, and something of this kind: She saw everything, but there was no idea whatever of perspective. She put her hand to the window to try to catch the trees on the other side of the street, then in Moorfields; she tried to touch the ceiling of a high ward; she was utterly ignorant also of common things—e. g., what such things as a bunch of keys were, of a silver watch, or a common cup and saucer; but when she shut her eyes and was allowed to touch them, (the educated sense) she told them at once! She could almost distinguish the greasy feel of a silver half-crown from the dry, harsh feel of a copper penny. Her joy was excessive when shown some mignonette and sweet pea that one of the surgeons had accidentally in his coat, for it seemed she knew all the plants in the clergyman's garden by the touch and smell. She looked at the bunch of keys, and with equal blankness at the bunch of flowers. then shut her eyes so as to recognize them. All this took up less than five minutes. But she failed to say, as well as I now remember, the case, these are flowers. But on my saying, when she opened her eyes again, "why, these are flowers;" "Oh! so they are," she replied, shutting her eyes again quickly, and putting them to her nose, "This is mignonette," etc.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday a numerous audience assembled in Maguire's Opera House, the attraction being the performance of the Seigrist family. Professor Siegrist performed some wonderfully clever gymnastic feats with his son, Master August Siegrist, and Mlle. Rosa Siegrist danced "La Manola," exhibiting much grace and skill, and giving general satisfaction. The feature of the entertainment, however, was the performanee of the dogs. Gymnasts as clever as the Siegrists, danseuses as graceful as Mlle. Rosa have visited this city; but such dogs never. A most pleasing feature in the performances of these remarkably sagacious and talented dogs was their evident affection for their master, and the pleasure and pride with which they appeared to show off their knowledge, proving that their training had been accomplished by means of kindness, and not by ill-treatment, which is too often the mode used to teaeh animals to perform unnatural tricks. A comedy and farce were given every evening, in addition to the Siegrist entertainment, and good houses resulted. On Wednesday, Mr. Walter Leman, the best old man on the California stage, and a most worthy middle-aged man off it, made his first appearancc since his return from the East, appearing in the character of "Sergeant Austerlitz" in the Maid of Croissy. He received a hearty welcome, and made a neat little speech in acknowledgment. On Friday the comic drama of Used Up was presented, Mr. Pauncefort filling the part of "Sir Charles Coldstream" capitally. This actor is making steady progress in the good opinion of the public—the more they see of him the better they like him, which is about as good a thing as he could wish said of him. In the afterpiece, Nobbs will Turn Him Out, Mr. Fred. Franks, who has recently joined the Opera House company, made his appearance in the part of "Nicodemus Nobbs," drawing forth peals of laughter from the audience. Mr. Franks is a good low comedian, and also possesses considerable versatility. He will prove a valuable addition to the company. This afternoon and evening the bill will be the same as yesterday, and the dogs will make their last appearance. These dogs have been most successful in drawing large numbers of spectators to witness their performances in all parts of the world. They came here from Peru, and it may be observed that they still retain their Peruvian bark. This afternoon the house should be crowded with children. On Monday the intensely sensational drama of The Workmen of San Francisco, versions of which are at present being played in some dozen different towns in the United States and England, will be produced. Much money and wondrous pains have been lavished on putting this piece on the stage. The machine shop, with machines and steam engines all moving, is a stage miracle, and does the stage manager infinite credit. To ensure a good house, we need only state that the sensation of the piece is the crushing of a woman in this machinery, which though an unpleasant sensation to her, will doubtless cause intense delight to the spectators.

At Wheatleigh's Eureka the drama of Jessie Brown, or the Siege of Lucknow, was played, with an afterpiece, during the first three nights of the week, and was admirably well performed. It was put upon the stage in fine style, and every member of the company played his or her part well. Mrs. Phelps' impersonation of "Jessie Brown" was a piece of acting which will long be remembered by those who witnessed it; in the last act she was positively grand. Mr. Reeves does not get much notice; in fact, it is not often he gets a chance of doing anything to deserve it. This being the case, I must remark that he played the character of "Nana Sahib" better than it has ever been played before on the California stage. He avoided ranting, and spoke in the impressive, somewhat monotonous voice, peculiar to the natives of Hindoostan. Mr. Reeves, having been born in Calcutta, had an opportunity of being faithful to nature in his impersonation of the character which he assumed. His "Nana Sahib" was, in fact, a study from life, he having seen and spoken to that monster before he had rendered himself infamously notorious. On Thursday Shakspeare's play of Twelfth Night, or What You Will, was produced, with new scenery, and what proved to be a most efficient cast. Mr. Wheatleigh was, of course, perfectly at home in "Malvolio;" Mrs. Fanny Morgan Phelps, by her faultless reading and fine acting in the character of "Viola," proved what a sterling actress she is; the "Sir Toby Belch" of Mr. Myers was a very clever piece of acting; the clown of Mr. Leach was all that could be desired—most admirable fooling. Mrs. Judah is so good an actress that she will bear criticism: her "Maria" was capital, with this exception, that she entirely omitted the by-play, so necessary during "Malvolio's" conversation with "Olivia," when he appears "cross-gartered and in yellow stockings." She appeared to have lost all interest in the success of the hoax which she had played upon the unfortunate steward. Miss Louise Clarkson's "Olivia" displayed care and the result of careful study; her reading was extremely creditable. Miss Gass made a very good "Sebastian." Mr. Percy's "Sir Andrew Aguecheek" was a good rendering of an ungrateful part, and was extremely natural. The piece was well, very well, played throughout, and should enjoy a successful run. Lovers of Shakspeare can go to see Twelfth Night, or What You Will, at Wheatleigh's Eureka, with the conviction that their favorite author does not suffer at the hands of this company. Great care has been bestowed upon its preparation, and the result is satisfactory in the highest degree. Twelfth Night will be performed this afternoon and evening, and will probably draw crowded houses during the greater portion of next week—it deserves to. When it is withdrawn, an Irish sensation drama will be produced. The new burlesque is in a progressive state. I am committing no breach of confidenee in stating that it is founded on the fall of the Mexican Empire, now foreshadowed.

TOUCHSTONE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

ON Monday evening Lucia di Lammermoor was reproduced at the Academy, with Signorina Brambilla in her favorite part of "Lucia," to a moderate house. Experience shows that it must be a novelty, and an attractive one at that, which will draw a good house on a Monday evening. The friends of the fair prima donna claim that "Lucia" is her best part, and—barring her performance of "Marguerite," in Faust—with some reason. Her rendering of the mad scene was espeeially impressive, and not over-acted by expression or gesture—a rare merit. On Thursday Barilli produced the Barber of Seville for his benefit, with the changes of Brambilla as "Rosina," and Grossi as "Doctor Bartolo." The house was full, and the opera was excellently rendered. Last night La Sonnambula was performed to a numerous and delighted audience.

At Sacramento the opera is highly successful, Manager Maguire having leased and refitted the Metropolitan Theatre of that city for its especial inauguration. The company opened on Monday evening last with Il Trovatore, and successively produced Norma, Martha and Lucrezia Borgia to audiences that tested the capacity of the theatre. The Bee says: "It is really a comfort, after a day's work, when caloric prevails, to take a clean and cosy seat, and listen to music properly rendered," and that "the opera warms on acquaintance." We should think that where "caloric prevails" it would be apt to.

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street, for the following new publications:

Companion Poets for the People. Illustrated. Household Poems. By Henry W. Longfellow. Boston: Tickuor & Fields.

The first of a new series of selected poems from the best American and English poets, to be issued in monthly volumes. The present specimen is handsomely printed on tinted paper, and illustrated with twelve or fifteen drawings on wood by well-known artists. Each volume is bound in paper—a circumstance to be regretted, as the general style is worthy of being preserved in a less perishable form. The thinnest and cheapest pasteboard we should imagine would meet the requirments of economy, and, at the same time, give each volume that permanent binding which its merits deserve. The selections from Longfellow comprise many of his most familiar pieces, such as "The Rainy Day," "Excelsior," "The Psalm of Life," "The Village Blacksmith" and "Rain in Summer," as well as the more scholarly and refined "Sandolphin," "The Ladder of St. Augustine," "Palingenisis," and two or three translations. In looking over this volume, which breathes the tender and melancholy aura of Longfellow's genius, we cannot but feel grateful to the publishers who have placed a pleasure so pure and refined within the reach of the most humble. Some idea of the popularity of cheap literature of the better class may be gained from the fact that Messrs. Tickuor & Fields have sold upwards of fifty thousand copies of their twenty five cent edition of Enoch Arden. The other volumes of this series are to be National Lyrics, by Whittier; Lyrics of Life, by Browning; Humorous Poems, by Holmes; and Religious Poems, by Mrs. Stowe.

In addition, the following volumes have been received from Messrs. Roman & Co., notices of which are deferred until next week: The Gayworthys, A Son of the Soil, The Young Lieutenant, Looking Around, Kilpatrick and our Cavalry, Illustrated Life of Lincoln, Life and Speeches of President Johnson, Prued's Poems, Only a Clod, Theo Leigh, On Guard, Hunted to Death, Miramichi.

We are indebted to H. H. Bancroft & Co., 609 Montgomery street, for the following new publications:

Home Ballads by our Home Poets, with illustrations by Darley. New York: Bunce & Huntington.

In intention and style the Home Ballads resemble the Companion Poets. But the selections do not seem to have been made with any critical taste or judgment. With the poems of so many authors of recognized ability to choose from, we should think that the dozen or more specimens of inferior merit from comparatively unknown writers might have been kept out of this volume. The work is bound in paper covers and is well printed.

Notices of the following volumes from the same publishers are deferred until next week: On Guard, Theo Leigh, Only a Clod, Carey's Record of the Great Rebellion, A Son of the Soil, The Orpheus C. Kerr Papers, Looking Around, The Young Lieutenant, Wylder's Hand.

THE BELLS OF AVIGNON.

AVIGNON was a joyous city,
A joyous town with many a steeple,
Towers and tourelles, roofs and turrets,
Sheltering a merry people.
In each tower, the bells of silver,
Bronze, or iron, swayed so proudly,
Tolling deep and swinging cheerly,
Beating fast and beating loudly.

One! Two! Three! Four! ever sounding;
Two! Four! One! Three! still repeating;
Five! Seven! Six! Eight! hurrying, chasing;
BIM-BOM-BING-BANG merry beating,
All the day the dancing sextons
Dragged at bell-ropes, rising, falling,
Clanging bells, inquiring, answering,
From the towers were ever calling.

Cardinals, in crimson garments,
Stood and listened to the chiming;
And within his lofty chutean
Sate the Pope, and beat the timing.
Minstrels, soldiers, monks and jesters
Laughed to hear the merry clamor,
As above them in the turrets
Music clashed from many a hammer.

Avignon was a joyous city:
Far away across the bridges,
'Mong the vine-slopes, upward lessening,
To the brown cliffs' highest ridges,
Clamored those sonorous bells;
In the Summer's noontide wrangling,
In one silver knot of music
All their chimes together tangling.

Showering music on the people
Round the town-house in the morning;
Scattering joy and jubilations,
Hope and welcome, wrath and scornings;
Ushering kings, or mourning pontiffs;
Clanging in the times of thunder,
And on nights when conflagrations
Clove the city half asunder.

Nights and nights across the river,
Through the darkness, starry-dotted,
Far across the bridge so stately,
Now by lichens blurred and blotted,
Came that floating, mournful music,
As from bands of angels flying,
With the loud blasts of the tempest
Still victoriously vieing.

Who could tell why Avignon
All its bells was ever pealing,
Whether to scare evil spirits,
Still round holy cities stealing.
Yet, perhaps, that ceaseless chiming,
And that pleasant silver beating,
Was but as of children playing,
And their mother's name repeating.

One! Two! Three! the bells went prattling,
With a music so untiring;
One! Two! Three! in merry cadence,
Rolling, crashing, clanging, firing.
Hence it was that in past ages,
When 'mid war those sounds seemed sweeter,
La Ville Sonnante people called it,
City sacred to Saint Peter.

Years ago! but now all silent,
Lone and sad, the grass-grown city,
Has its bell-towers all deserted
By those ringers—more 's the pity.
Pope and cardinal are vanished;
And no music fills the night-air;
Gone the red robes and the sable;
Gone the crosier and the mitre.

ROBBED.—Henry Plughoff, a teamster, was robbed on Sunday evening, while on his way from La Porte to Marysville, by three men armed with pistols and shot guns. As Henry was descending the Stanfield hill his life or his money was demanded, and he handed over his change and a check for $925. The robbers poeketed the money, but handed back the check, and ordered the teamster to drive on.

THE Boston Post says: "The New Yorkers are after Dr. Bellows with a sharp stick for saying to the Philadelphians that they had done more—except San Francisco—for the support of the Sanitary Commission than any other city."

THE BEST PIANO.—The Chicago Evening Journal's musical correspondent, writing about the competition at the State Fair in musical instruments, says: "Two hours after I sent my dispatch yesterday, Messrs. Root & Cady, of Chicago, were awarded the premium for one of Bradbury's New Scale Pianos. The prediction, contained in that dispatch that no other piano upon exhibition stood a ghost of a chance, was verified notwithstanding the fact that there were pianos of celebrated makers in competition. I record this triumph with all the more pleasure because of their patriotic and truly magnificent gift of a $1,500 piano to the Soldiers' Fair now in progress here, and meeting with great success.

THE FIFTH INDUSTRIAL FAIR
OF THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE
OF SAN FRANCISCO,
TO BE HELD IN THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE PAVILION,
IN AUGUST, 1865.

The MECHANICS' INSTITUTE having determined to hold their Fifth Industrial Fair during the coming season, the Executive Committee would respectfully invite all persons desirous of exhibiting Machines, Manufactures, Agricultural Implements, Horticultural Products, Minerals, Ores and Works of Art, to make application immediately, in order that the proper space may be allotted them.
The Exhibition will be opened on THURSDAY, the 10th day of August, at 10 o'clock A. M.
The general management of the Fair is entrusted to an Executive Committee, consisting of the officers of the Institute.
No contracts or agreements will be recognized, unless made by the authorized agents of this committee.
A competent person will be in attendance at the Pavilion to receive and register all goods designed for exhibition, and will receipt therefor.
Contributions of machinery and other articles that require long time to prepare for exhibition, will be received from the 15th of July to the 2d of August.
Articles for exhibition that require large space may be entered on or before the 20th day of July, and space will be allotted to the exhibitor on or before the 2d of August.
The Picture Galleries will be ready for the reception of Pictures, Embroidery, Wax and Fancy Work of all kinds on the 1st of August, when space will be allotted.
The committee will be prepared for the reception of Fruits, Flowers, Agricultural and Horticultural productions, and design to have the tables so arranged that the best display possible can be made in this department; and every effort will be made and care taken to preserve their freshness, so that exhibitors may receive full credit for their productions. Those wishing space on these tables should engage it at an early day. There will be space reserved for additions to this department during the Fair.
The several transportation companies, as on former occasions, have, with commanding liberality, consented to transport articles intended exclusively for exhibition, free of charge, and Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co., in like manner, will take charge of them.
The committee have the fullest confidence that the coming Fair will not only be the most complete and varied in its character, but will also be more attractive than any previous Exhibition of the kind on this coast.
No pains or expense will be spared to give the contributors satisfactory opportunities in the spacious Pavilion of the Institute for the display of their contributions, and to furnish whatever may be necessary to make the Fair an institution where those who frequent it may be pleased and instructed.
All articles forwarded should be labelled, "For the Industrial Fair," San Francisco.
All communications to be addressed to C. S. HIGGINS, Corresponding Secretary.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.—Charles M. Plum, Chairman; Josiah Moulton, James R. Deane, A. A. Snyder, W. W. Hunscom, Edward Nunan, D. A. MacDonald, C. S. Higgins, David Dwyer, H. K. Cummings, J. W. Reay; P. B. Dexter, Secretary. my27

FASHION, 1725.

SHE was dressed in the height of the reigning mode. The pyramid or bell of whalebone, in which she was encaged, and which, under the name of hoop, had succeeded the Elizabethau farthingale to be the precusor of the Victorian crinoliue, was covered with a magnificent petticoat of rich satin, whose ground of white and red was flowered with huge scarlet blossoms, all bedropped with golden dew-spangles. Over this, looped up high in frout and hanging iu loose folds behind, was a yellow satin gown, brocaded with silver stars. A white beaver hat, faced with blue silk and adorned with gold lace, rested daintily on a thick clustering mass of short, fair curls. Two little spots or patches of black velvet, one over the left eyebrow, another on the left cheek, denoted the leaning of the fair politician towards Toryism. And, as she came swimming on, with saucy smiles dimpliug on her chcek, on which a shade of artificial rose blushed its delicate pink, shc dangled in one hand her vizard-mask, holding it by the head, which, when caught between the teeth, was used to keep it in position upon the face, and the other flirting with careless grace a fan of monstrous size, on which Tohn Wootton had painted a humorous scene of horsemanship from Bartholomew Fair. It was my lady Belinga Brocade, a fashiouable young widow, erroneously supposed to be very rich, but who had sufficient wit and skill to keep up the popular delusion on that subject by splendid dressing and reckless expenditure which vied with that of the wealthiest persons of quallty in London. Her obsequious attendant was Sir Charles Buckram, a baronet of ancient lineage, but dilapidated estate, who not only admired the pretty widow's face and figurc, but was smitteu also by a secret and stronger passion for the money bags ascribed by popular rumor to her dead husband, and supposed to havc beeu entrusted by his last will and testament to her care. We see in Sir Charles the model of a beau in the later days of George I. A full white periwig, flowing in thick massed-curls upon his shoulders, and jutting forward till his face was almost buried in a nest of snowy hair—a square cut coat of sky-blue velvet, laced with gold, the flapped pockets of its ample skirts expanded by au invisiblc cage of thin wire—a long waistcoat of white satin, brocaded with grecn and red leaves, flapping down with deep pockets almost to the knee—wide cuffs folded back six inches to permit rich ruffles of Mechlin lace, matching his long lace cravat, to expand their snowy charms —breeches of black velvet—tight stockings of cobweb scarlet silk, adorned with gold clocks—long black square-toed shocs, with gold buckles and high red heels—armed him capa-pie for conquest. But to complete the picture we must clap below his arm a small three-cornered hat, laccd with gold galloon and edged wlth a trimming of ostrich feather—pass through thc stiffened coat-skirt the cane scabbard of a small sword, from whose gold hilt, tipped with ruby, hangs a sword knot of blue ribbons tied with tassels of lace—give to one hand a foreign stick carved with a moukey's head, aud to the other an ivory snuff-box, rimmed with diamonds, and adorned on the lid with a miniature group by Watteau, while fringed gloves and a highly musked mouchoir peep carclessly from bclow the pocket-flaps of his resplendeut coat.—From Dr. Collier's Pictures of the Periods.

A Mistake.—An amusing incident occurred the other day in a fashionable music store, which should teach clerks to be careful in their sports: It appears that the clerks in the store had acquired a habit of playiug off little tricks upon each other, and one of the sports was, if one saw the other stooping down to select music or for any other purpose, he would seize a board, generally the top of a box, and hit the stooping victim. This practice had gone ou for some time, wheu one day one of the clerks who had caught the board most se erely for some transgression, and was laying low to catch his enemy in position that he might pay him off with interest, entercd the store, and at the eud of the counter he saw, to his great delight, his fellow clerk doubled up iu a beautiful position, with his head among the lower shelves and his body at an angle. "Now," thought he, "is my time, Mr. Jerry!" So he selected a good stiff board about four feet long, and cautiously approachiug, he gave a blow that sounded all over the store, and brought him erect at once. At that moment Jerry appeared from behind a stack of books, with his face swollen with suppressed laughter, and the gentleman who was struck stood in utter amazement, rubbing himself most dexterously. The offending clerk discovered, to his great astonishment aud regret, that he had struck his worthy pastor, the Rev. Dr. ———, who was busy selecting music. Of course, he was ready to fall upon his knees for forgiveness. But the deed was doue.

Soon after the death of the brave and lamented Colonel Mulligan, a subscription was started in Chicago for his widow. The treasurer now reports that the sum of $7,664 was collected, of which $5,125 was paid for a homestead for Mrs. Mulligan, and the balance, $2,529, was paid over to her.

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Honduras has been officially proclaimed. It provides for perpetual amity and a reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation.

An Elephant Story.—Wilkes' Spirit of the Times gives the following incident in the history of the famous elephant Hannibal, now deceased:

"Hannibal was an original emancipationist. In 1858 he carried an emancipation proclamation [in his trunk] into South Carolina, which he issued in the form of a "Trumpet Blast of Freedom" extra, and which effectually abolished slavery from one section of the State—for a short time, at least. It happened in this wise: The menagerie was crossing the Black Warrior river, and Hannibal was taken in to swim it. Now, an elephant can stay under water a long time, and by stretching the trunk so as to reach the surface for air, can float far below for hours without giving any visible sign of his presence. On this occasion, after swimming very nicely for a while, he made a dive. His keeper, who was in a small boat, stopped rowing, and waited for him to come up again. After waiting a reasonable time without the elephant putting in an appearance, the keeper mistrusted that something was wrong, and commenced rowing in a circle, as if he were pulliug for a wager, iu hopes of finding some indication of the brute. Leaving the keeper thus employed, we will follow the elephant, who, going with the current, had floated down the river, turned a bend, and, after enjoying a delightful bath, began to look for a landing-place. He found one twelve miles from the spot where he started, on the edge of a cotton field, in which about three hundred darkies of all ages and both sexes were at work. A big 'swash,' and a tremendous blast from the elephant's trunk, drew their attention to the river, from the very depths of which they saw a black monster emerging, the water rolling from his sides, his immense ears flapping wildly, his fearful tusks pointed directly at them. On he came, and away went they! The appearance of such a creature, under such circumstances, would startle anybody; but the effect produced upon these ignorant plantation hands, a great portion of whom were not aware that there was such an animal as an elephant in existence, can better be imagined than described. They were all satisfied that the Evil One had come for them, sure enough; and as they fled in wild confufusion, they spread the story among all whom they met with such terrific exaggerations that in twelve hours, it is said, there was not a 'cullud pussun,' free nor bond, to be found in the country. It is certain that for two weeks afterwards the menagerie people daily encountered planters looking for slaves who had disappeared after Hannibal's unlooked-for visit to the plantation."

Mlle. Rosa Bonheur's New Picture.—The annual exhibition of the French School of Art is now open, and, as perhaps many of our readers know, says the New York Review, the great picture of the year is by Mlle. Rosa Bouheur—"A Family of Deer crosing the Summit of the Long Rocks" (Forest of Fontainebleau)—is a picture well worthy of some notice. It consists of a wild arid plain, studded with rocks and stones, over which a very charming family of seven deer are passing. The animals, as may be supposed, form the chief objects in the landscape; but vigorous as is their treatment, the foreground and middle distance will please the lover of good painting almost as much. The time is early morning, and below the gray clouds and half misty, half glaring light of breaking day, may be imagined, rather than seen, the first gleams of the sun's rays. The effect of this almost unseen rosy tint is indescribably beautiful, and does credit even to such a well-known artist as Mademoiselle Rosa Bonheur. But the family itself is worthy of a prolonged study. The old father, proud in his strength and beauty, sniffs the air, as if he fancied a stranger were near; the mother, with ears erect, looks round to see that none of her charges are missing; but the young ones themselves, appareutly as giddy as many other young people, seem to trouble themselves very little about the matter, and gambol about in great delight. The animal at the extreme right of the picture, iu the act of drinking, is exceedingly well drawn, though we fancy the position of the bent fore leg is hardly as natural as it might be. In truth, however, the point in which Mlle. Bonheur appears to have least succeeded is in the legs of the deer: all of them are rather too woodeny, though the color is good. The pool from which the deer is drinking is marvellously painted, and the disturbance caused by his foot in the water is perfectly natural. It is this peculiar power of painting "like nature" which renders Mlle. Bouheur's pictures so plcasing and beautiful; and in the one we are now noticing, like all her others, she has certainly not failed in this respect.

Swallows.—In Swedcn the swallows, as soon as the winter begins to approach, pluuge themselves iuto the lakes, where they remain asleep and hidden under the ice till the returu of Summer; wheu, revived by the new warmth, they come out from thc water and fly away as formerly. While the lakes are frozen, if somebody will break the ice in those parts where it appears darker than the rest, he will fiud masses of swallows—cold, asleep, and half dead; which, by takiug out of their retreat and warming, either with his hands or bcfore a fire, he will see gradually to vivify again and fly. In other countries they retire very often to the caverns, under the rocks. As many of these exist between the city of Caen and thc sea, on the banks of the river Orne, there are found sometimes duriug the winter piles of swallows suspended in these vaults, like bunches of grapes. People have witnessed the same thing in Italy; wherc, as well as in France, it is considered very lucky by the inhabitants when swallows build nests on their habitations.

Theatricals, etc., Abroad.—The New York Clipper of July 1st gives a complete resumé of theatrical matters, from which we make a few extracts:

Miss Lotta terminated her performances at the New Chestnut, Philadelphia, on the 24th June. During the week she appeared in various pieces, among them the Ticket-of-Leave Man, in which she took the character ol "Sam Willoughby." Miss Lotta has made many friends in the Quaker city.

The Webb sisters have been doing a pretty fair business at the Arch, Philadelphia.

Mrs. Emily Jordan and Frank Lawler are about to start on a starring tour for the coming Fall and Winter season.

Mrs. Leighton and Yankee Locke have been playing an engagement recently at McVicker's Theatre, Chicago, to good audiences. The Keans were announced for June 26th, at the same theater.

Cotton & Murphy's California Minstrels were at the Chestnut-street Theatre, Philadelphia, June 29th. The troop now consists of Ben Cotton, Joe Murphy, W. H. Smith, W. H. Luis, Master Bennie Cotton, Frank Campbell, Joe Crosher, R. Tyrrell, Jr., J. Tannebaum, F. Blum, George Clarendon, George Ross, H. Koehler, and H. Barker.

Adah Isaacs Menken commenced a series of farewell performances at Astley's, London, June 19th.

J. B. Booth was released from confinement in the Old Capitol Prison at Washington, D. C., June 23d. It is stated that his release was unconditional.

Singular Case of Mistaken Identity.—At the battle of Chancellorsville, Samuel Randall, a member of the Seventy-first Pennsylvania Regiment, was supposed to have been killed, since he was missing from his regiment, and had been seen to fall by some of his comrades. The fact was communicated to his relatives, who reside in Frankford, Pennsylvania; his body, or what was supposed to be his body, was recovered after considerable difficulty, and sent home. Those who had known the deceased in life, aud who kuew him well, saw in the features of the corpse the familiar ones of their frieud. Even his own family was deceived. On the appointed day the funeral took place, the military in the town paraded with reversed arms, and when the coffin rested in its grave at Cedar Hill Cemetery, a parting salute was fired. There is now in the cemetery a mound nicely sodded, and flowers bloom upon its summit; a tombstone stands at its head, with the usual epitaph, set off with military emblems. So far, good; but we are told that this same Randall returned lately, much to the fright of his family and the pleasure of his friends. Everything concerning his mysterious absence was satisfactorily explained, and the returned soldier has the rare privilege of looking upon his own grave and tombstone, and readiug his own epitaph.

Rachel was very stingy, as everybody knows. She once gave a great dinner to the creme de la noble société. In the morning she rode out with a well-known French critic and gourmand, and requested him to help her select an excellent dessert. They rode to Chevet's, the greatest fruit-dealer in Paris, and selected the dessert. She was just going to leave the place, when Chevet asked her if she did not want a pineapple, as an ornament for the table?

"How much is it?"

"Seventy francs. Pineapples are very dear in Europe."

"That is too much for me," she said. "But would you not rent it to me?"

Chevet laughed and consented.

At the dinner the critic sat next to the Duke of San Teodoro, and at the dessert he said to the latter:

"Do you see that delicious pineapple?"

"Parbleu!" said the Duke; "I came near forgetting it."

The Duke rose, took a large and sharp knife, and made a deep cut in the fruit. Rachel, who saw it, was struck by this deed as by a dagger in a tragedy. A cry of grief came from her breast.

"What is the matter?" asked Ponsary. "Has Madame Rachel a pineapple in her breast?"

She could not be consoled during the whole evening.

Bother your Schtaff.—Just before the capture of Savannah, General Logan, with two or three of his staff, entered the depot at Chicago, one fine morning, to take the cars East, on his way to rejoin his command. The General, being a short distance in advance of the others, stepped upon the platform of a car, about to enter it, but was stopped by an Irishman, with, "Yees'll not be goin' in there." "Why not, sir?" asked the General. "Because thim's a leddies caer, and no gintleman'll be goin' in there widout a leddy. There's wan sate in that caer over there, ef yees want it," at the same time pointing to it. "Yes," replied the General, "I see there is one seat; but what shall I do with my staff?" "Oh! bother your schtaff?" was the petulent reply; "go and take the sate, an' schtick yer schtaff out o' the windy."

President Lincoln's log cabin, which he personally helped to build in the days of his youth and poverty, was the most interesting object on exhibition at the great Sanitary Fair at Chicago, recently. It was brought piecemeal from its original location, and erected inside a broad enclosure at the corner of Randolph street and Wabash avenue. The first week of the Fair realized over $100,000.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Friseo,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

RARE CHANCE

TO SECURE

DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent.	per day on a	$50	note.
Two cents	"	$100	"
Ten "	"	$500	"
20 "	"	$1,000	"
$1 "	"	$5,000	"

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers through out the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

THE SABBATH BELLS.

SUNDAY, JULY 30, 1865.

RING, Sabbath bells, O softly ring,
And with your peaceful accents bring
To loving ears a welcome tale
Of flowing seas and gentle gale;
Ring!

Peal, all ye Sabbath bells—O peal,
And tell the few who watch and kneel
Of hidden snares and sunken rocks,
Of surges white and sudden shocks;
Peal!

Toll, O ye Sabbath bells, and toll
Each passing soul and heroic soul:
Toll for the sacrifices sweet,
For duty done, and work complete—
Toll!

Chime, O ye Sabbath bells, O chime!
Each man has his appointed time;
The worst is but a glad release;
Chime, Sabbath bells, a song of Peace,
Chime!

THE WOODPECKER.

A BUSY woodpecker! What would you call
This monk of a fellow, tapping a tree,
With little cells like a catacomb hall
To bury his acorns in? what would you call
Such a curious monk as he?

Tucking his acorns away in their tomb
To feed upon by-and-by, at his will—
Does he ever think of the hidden bloom
In the acorn's heart? though shut in the tomb,
There's a germ of life nursed there still.

Time is a woodpecker, crowding the cells
Of the catacombed earth with holy dead;
But there's a bud of life that swells
In the oak tree's might, and it shatters the cells
As the soul when the life has fled.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

THE Flag is aptly termed by the Dramatic Chronicle "The Country Paper in Town;" it appears to have a deadly hatred for San Francisco and its inhabitants. We clip the following from the British Colonist:

"HARD TIMES.—The San Francisco Flag says there are over 1,000 stores and tenements placarded 'to let' in that city, and that the people are leaving the city like rats deserting a sinking ship."

This paragraph will of course be published by all the "country papers" with great pleasure. The citizens of Victoria were not very much grieved when they read it in the Colonist, as, if it were true, they might expect an influx of population. We can assure the interior papers that San Francisco is by no means in a sinking condition, and that the Flag will be in a bad fix when the "rats" all leave it.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III, Scene 2.

A FEW days ago a most remarkable leader appeared in the Morning Call, with the caption, "Great by Chance." The editor evidently witnessed the representation of Twelfth Night at the Eureka Theatre—was struck by an idea, and, immediately before the inspiration left him, wrote his leader. He commences thus:

"When Shakspeare placed in the mouth of Malvolio the expression, "Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them," he was about as near the whole truth and philosophy of the matter as the love-sick steward with his cast of mind was able to get; as near, probably, as the world at the time of Shakspeare's writing was capable of getting. Strictly speaking, no man is born great; really very few actually achieve greatness wholly by their own exertions; actually the number is small who have greatness thrust upon them; and probably the truth is, that more men are made great by chance than in any other manner."

Shakspeare receives the endorsement of the Morning Call. Mark that. Shakspeare got very near the truth considering the time at which he wrote. How true is the remark of the editor that "Strictly speaking, no man is born great." Of course no man is born great, for he is a small baby when he is born. How did Shakspeare come to make such a mistake? Had the editor wished to be hypercritical, he might have gone further and said that "strictly speaking" no man is born at all, for it is only babies that are born. Here is the gist of the editor's powerful leader:

"History teaches us that circumstances have made more great men than either birth, exertions, or "thrusting" influences."

We are happy to find on reading to the end of the leader, that there is really no difference of opinion between the editor of the Call and Shakspeare, and that, though he is doubtless unaware of the fact, he only says in half a column of words what Shakspeare expressed in half a dozen, namely, that some men become great by force of circumstances, or to express the same thing in different words, have greatness thrust upon them. In spite of the progress made by the world since the period at which Shakspeare wrote, and notwithstanding the startling originality of the editorials of the Call as compared with those which appear in another city paper which has had greatness thrust upon it, we must confess that we have never as yet been able to discover in them one idea which was not better expressed many years ago by the poet who wrote for all time.

WHAT a mass of wheels does the interior of a lever watch present to view! So much machinery required to move those tiny hands which tell how time flies! Then, hidden away, noiselessly throbbing with unerring regularity, is the hair-spring. Break that, and disorder succeeds order, and what seemed almost an intelligence is reduced to an inert mass of metal. A newspaper is not unlike a watch; the public sees the face and scarcely gives a thought to the machinery which is daily, nightly, in motion. Still less does it concern itself about the hair-spring which regulates all the movements which, together, produce that strange conglomerate whole—a newspaper. Mournfully and humbly do the proprietors of the Bulletin confess that that paper has, in losing James Nisbet, lost its very soul, its vital principle. For the moment it is paralyzed; but let us hope that James Nisbet, though dead, will yet live in the work which will serve as a monument to tell how faithfully he labored. Let the Bulletin continue what he made it—the leading journal of California; the proudest columns which can be reared to his memory will be the columns which he ever willed should be devoted to the furtherance of the ends of truth and justice.

GOVERNOR LOW'S letter to the people of California is a credit to him. It is written in excellent English. If Mayor Coon only wrote his proclamations in as good English as that in which our Governor writes his letters, what a happy people we should be. We should like to see a letter from each of the candidates who are still in the field, to judge whether Governor Low hadn't better be sent to the Senate whether he likes it or no. Wonder whether Governor Low did write that letter?

THE Opera of Medea was produced, for the first time in England, at her Majesty's Theatre on the 6th of June. A London paper speaking of it, says: "The young, fresh voices of the choristers, more especially the trebles, (somewhat severely tested in the noble choral music Cherubini has composed for this opera,) did good service throughout the evening." Why didn't the critic, if he wished to pay the boys a compliment, say "they sang Cherubini's music like a cherubim, or in a perfectly Cherubimi manner?" We wonder whether "Cherubini" isn't the plural of "cherub" in Italian?

WADDLE told one of his victims if he ran short of provisions to cook a Kanaka. A sandwich(d) islander ought to make a nice lunch.

THE New York Leader is an admirable newspaper; not only are its original articles brilliant and sparkling, but those which it selects display admirable judgment. In order that the typographical appearance of its pages may not be disfigured by unsightly italics, the Leader makes it a rule not to give credit, it appears. No doubt when it published in its issue of June 24th those six little specimens of "Mousetrap" matter, as editorial paragraphs, it thought we ought to be uncommonly flattered, that it, the great New York Leader, should condescend to purloin from us. We were; we entreat the Leader to publish the whole page, localizing the paragraphs. Don't stop at six paragraphs; take a dozen. THE CALIFORNIAN generally gives New York papers credit when it transfers anything from their columns to its own; but if the Leader doesn't like to, it needn't mind; THE CALIFORNIAN is a perfect Mr. Toots—"its of no consequence, thank you." If the Leader is really hard up for jokes—it appears to pilfer, puns particularly—the writer of the present article will be most happy to send it a large parcel, "C. O. D—to be kept dry." We wonder if all the New York journals follow the Leader; if so, we shall probably catch some of them in the "Mousetrap" before long.

PRINTERS often find, after placing a number of paragraphs in type in the form, that a line more is required to complete a column, and as long as they can get a "single line article" to make up the required measure they do not, as a rule, care very much what sentiment may be conveyed by it. We notice in a number of the interior papers the following: "Give us this day our daily bread." Piety is beautiful wherever it is met with, even in the columns of a country paper. Having made use of this extract from the Lord's Prayer, we hope they will not stop here but will get as far as "Forgive us our trespasses." If the Lord's Prayer is thus put in circulation, a line at a time, it is possible that, in the course of a few months, every editor in the State will have repeated the whole of it. We are sure that nothing but extreme destitution has driven these editors to make use of this prayer for "single line articles." As they appear to be so much in want we suggest the following:

"Pity the sorrows of a poor old man."
"Let dogs delight to bark and bite."
"Oru pro nobis."
"His soul goes marching on."
"Lord have mercy upon us miserable sinners."
"Thou shalt not steal."

So much for a beginning; when they have been used we shall be happy to supply more.

LOOSELY letting a not slip appears to have got the Bulletin proprietors into a tangle. E. P. Clarke charged with embracery, was found not guilty by the jury; the Bulletin, in its report, omitted the word "not," and E. P. Clarke embraces the opportunity to bring a suit for libel. The Bulletin on the following day corrected the error it had made and expressed its sorrow at its having occurred. E. P. Clarke although the offence consisted in merely a word too little, is not willing to accept an apology in words, but prefers it in the shape of $50,000. We hope the Bulletin will be careful to report the verdict in the libel suit correctly. It would be convenient to leave out a figure in stating the damages awarded, thus: $00,000.

WE have seen a good many sensational headings to telegraphic dispatches which were strange, but the following is very extraordinary:

[SPECIAL DISPATCH TO VIRGINIA DAILY UNION.]

SAN FRANCISCO, July 31—9 P. M.

Eastern Line—Colfax Arrived—Discharged and Sues the Bulletin—Will be Repaired—Low Probably Withdraws.

"Colfax Arrived—Discharged and Sues the Bulletin!" A very bad beginning for him to make, we think. Is it possible that every one who is in want of funds will sue the Bulletin—institute a libel suit—for the purpose of making a raise? "Will be Repaired." Colfax evidently got damaged; it is comforting to know that he is not past repairing. We fancy there is a line or two left out of that heading, but we cannot help that; we have quoted it correctly, and if newspapers will make typographical errors they must expect to have them picked up.

"A Massachusetts judge has decided that 'a husband may open his wife's letters.'"

"then, of course," the ladies will say, "a wife may open her husband's." Not a bit of it. The husband won't avail himself of this permission; he'll be too polite; he hasn't any curiosity—except in special cases—but goodness gracious, suppose the wife was given permission to open her husband's letters! We tremble when we think of the result. It wouldn't do at all; it would only make the dear creatures uncomfortable; they'd be sure to misunderstand them. No, no; as Mr. Theophilus Parsons, of Cambridge, very justly observes, "the husband and wife are one and the husband is that one."

TREM

THE TRACK OF BLOOD.

ABOUT half a mile from the village of Poaktown, facing the high road to Balston, and separated from the river Poak by a small garden and a belt of trees, is a long low cottage, known in the neighborhood as "The Building." It originally consisted of two cottages, and went by the name of "Marwood's Buildings;" but who Marwood was, and what had induced him to build such uncomfortable cottages, had escaped the memory of even the oldest inhabitants. The building contained four rooms; a kitchen and a sitting-room on the ground floor, and two bedrooms above. The original partition-wall between the two cottages, and the two separate staircases, still remained. One led from the sitting-room to the bedroom above, where Mr. Vance, the present occupier of the building, slept; the other went from the kitchen to the bedroom of Mary Edgecombe, his only servant.

Mr. Joseph Vauce, who was a spare-built, clean-shaven man of about forty, with gray hair and no whiskers, and with nothing remarkable about him, except a deep cut over his right eyebrow, had now been occupying the building for a little over a year. When he first came into the neighborhood, the gossip of Poaktown had speculated a great deal as to who and what he was, but without any basis for their conjectures. He never himself volunteered any information as to his previous life, except that on one occasion he had been a sea-captain. People, too, who had been inside "the building" since Vance's tenantcy, had noticed the drawing of a ship, and some shells lying about the room. This was considered enough to confirm his statement, and on the strength of it the village called him the Captain.

Nothing more was known of the Captain, and curiosity about him had nearly died out, when Sarah Epps, on her return from Stokemouth, where she had been on a visit to her sister, who had married a pilot at that flourishing seaport, brought news about him, which set the village-ears tingling for some time. The pilot, her brother-in-law, remembered the Captain when he was in the China trade, and Sarah was full of smuggling stories, and even piracy, in which the Captain had taken a leading part; but then all knew that Sarah was an incorrigible gossip, and that any story under her management would grow considerably. The Captain meanwhile troubled himself very little about the village-talk, living a quiet life in his lonely cottage with his only servant, a buxom widow of thirty-five. Sarah Epps had been heard to say that she was more than a servant to him, but then nobody minded Sarah's tittle-tattle.

About the time our story commences, the Captain had got into some trouble. His landlord, an easy-going, well-to-do tradesman of Poaktown, began to think that, as he expressed it, he should like to see the color of the Captain's money. The house had been occupied for more than a year, and not a penny of rent as yet been paid. The fact had for some time been gradually dawning on the neighbors that, since the first months he had occupied the building, ready money had not been plentiful with the Captain, and that for the last eight or nine months little or nothing had been paid for. The sums owing were not large, for the Captain lived a quiet, simple life. But it was reckoned that altogether, they must amount to over £100: and that was a serious sum to the village-tradesmen, and to all appearances a very difficult one for the Captain to pay. He was dunned, and legal proceedings were threatened, but all attempts to get the money were only met by civil excuses. The patience of his creditors was nearly exhausted, when one day a circular letter was sent to them, appointing a meeting at twelve o'clock on the following Monday, "when," the Captain wrote, "he would satisfy all claims, as a legacy left by a distant relation had been paid in to his account at the Balston Bank."

On Saturday, the Captain walked into Poaktown, and hired a gig at the "King's Arms" to take him to Balston. Johnny Wilson, the landlord's son, drove him to the bank at Balston, where he stayed about ten minutes, and came out at the end of that time buttoning into the breast-pocket of his coat a fat looking pocket-book. Johnny then waited for him while he made a few purchases in town, and then drove him straight home to the "building."

At six o'clock on Sunday morning, the inhabitants of the quiet High street of Poaktown were aroused by a violent knocking at the door of the police-station. The policeman who was on night-duty opened the door, and Mary Edgecombe, white with terror, and panting for breath, nearly fell into his arms, gasping out that her master, the Captain, had been robbed and murdered in the night. The Inspector was almost immediately called, and the whole available police force of the village, consisting of two policemen, set off with him for the building. Mary Edgecombe, who seemed utterly prostrate, remained under the care of the Inspector's wife.

On reaching the "building," the Inspector found the front undisturbed, the windows closed, and the doors locked. On going round to the back, the door leading from the sitting-room to the garden, which sloped down to the river, was found to be open, and on entering the sitting-room, drops of blood were seen along the carpet between the staircase and the garden-door. On the staircase itself the drops of blood were more frequent. The bedroom, however, was clearly the place where the murder had been committed. The table by the window had been pushed out of its place; the only two chairs in the room were lying on the floor. The bed, which had not been slept in, was deluged with blood, and in the middle of it was a deep indentation, as if a heavy body had been pressed down upon it. A large clasp-knife stained with blood was lying on the pillow, and by the door on the floor was an open pocket-book. So much the Inspector saw at a glance as he entered. He took the pocket-book, and looked carefully through it; it was empty; but lying near it, and behind the door, was a piece of neatly-folded paper. It had evidently fallen from the pocket-book while the murderer was emptying the contents. It was a half sheet of note-paper folded in three, and written on it were the numbers and value of forty-two bank-notes, the total of which amounted to £270. Here was a clue at once. The murderer, evidently wishing to carry about him nothing which might aid detection, had left the pocket-book behind, but in his hurry had overlooked this paper. Policeman Jones was immediately sent off to Balston with the paper, to inquire of the manager whether those were the numbers of the notes which had been paid to the Captain the day before, and if so, to take measures to stop them. He also received orders to telegraph immediately to Scotland Yard an account of the murder, and any facts he might ascertain at Balston.

So far, so good; but where, after all, was the body? From the blood on the stairs and in the sitting-room, and the open garden-door, it was presumed that it had been removed from the house. After locking the bedroom door, the Inspector proceeded to the garden. Outside the door, on the grass, were the footsteps of a man, the toes pointing toward the house, and the heels deeply indented in the soft earth. The rest of the footprint was partly obliterated as if something heavy had been dragged over them. The murderer must have gone out of the sitting-room backward, dragging the body of his victim after him. Across the small grass plot, and half-way through the belt of trees, the footsteps continued; there they ceased. On the soft mud and leaves was an impression as if a body had been laid there; near this impression, lying on the ground, was a spade, and at the distance of a few feet the ground had been dug up, as if it had been intended to bury the body there. This project, however, had been almost immediately given up, for the work was scarcely begun. The murderer had been interrupted, or perhaps had thought of a better plan for disposing of the body. But where? The policeman and the Inspector looked at one another; they had come to the same conclusion. "In the river, of course!" Sure enough, on the river-bank the footprints were again found. This time they pointed forward, and not backward, and the impression was clear and sharp. The body must have been carried. The river at this point was deep and sluggish; there would be little difficulty in dragging it. Drags were sent for, and the Inspector went home to breakfast, leaving a policeman in charge of the premises, with orders to admit no one except on business.

The Inspector had hardly finished his breakfast, when Policeman Jones returned from Balston. He had been eminently successful. The bank-manager had identified the numbers on the paper as those of the bank-notes paid the day before to the Captain. The money, it appeared, had been paid to him in pursuance of an order contained in a letter received that Saturday morning from their London correspondents, Cowie, Nabob, & Co., the great China and Indian bankers. Jones had then made inquiries in the town, and at the railway station. At the station he found that a man in a great coat and wide-awake hat, who was muffled up in a comforter, and who seemed to avoid observation, had left that morning for London by the 5:50 train. He had offered a £5 note in payment for his ticket. The clerk remembered this, from the difficulty he had in getting change so early on Sunday morning. The note was produced, and found to be one of those stolen from the Captain. A description of the man and orders for his apprehension had been telegraphed to London, and an answer had been received, stating that the police were on the murderer's track, but that, to make all safe, a detective would be in Poaktown by the middle of the day.

Mary Edgecombe, who had partially recovered from her fright, was now taken to the building. She identified the clasp-knife, pocket-book, and various articles of clothing which were lying about the Captain's room, as belonging to him. She stated that she had gone to bed at nine o'clock on the previous night, and that she had heard no noise during the night. She was positive that no one was in the house when she went to bed, except herself and the Captain. But the garden-door was often left unlocked, and could then be opened from the outside. The Inspector was satisfied. The motive was clear enough; the police were close upon the murderer's track; all that was now wanted was the body.

He then turned to the river, pleased at the promptness and energy he had shown, and chuckling to think that the London detective would find nothing to do when he did arrive. The drags had now been at work for sometime, but without success. The river had been dragged up and down, and sideways and across, and at every conceivable angle, but no body had been found. The Inspector was getting impatient, when a gig drove up to the building, and a dapper little man, in a frock-coat buttoned to his chin, and with a heavy black mustache, jumped out. The crowd, which had collected by this time, made way respectfully, for it was whispered that the stranger was no other than detective Perkins from London.

In a few minutes the detective had heard all that the Inspector had to tell.

"Wait one moment," said he, "let's get it all straight. All the village, you say, knew the Captain would have money to pay his debts to-morrow."

The Inspector nodded.

"Which amounted in all to £100, more or less?"

The Inspector nodded again.

"And he drew out of the bank £270. Was that the whole legacy?"

"It was."

"He didn't want £270 to pay £100, did he?"

This was a new light to the Inspector, who shook his head cautiously.

"From whom did the order to pay the money come?"

"Cowie, Nabob, & Co.," repeated Perkins, referring to his note-book; "the great China House."

"And you suspect no one?"

"No one, except the man who passed the note."

"Of course. But this woman who lived with him—" suggested Perkins.

The Inspector shook his head.

"It's a man's doing. She wouldn't have the strength. Besides, the footprints are a man's all over."

"No one who had a grudge against him?"

"There was a good many that couldn't get their money from him, but that's not enough to account for this," said the Inspector, jerking his thumb toward the river.

They entered the building. The crowd outside were getting more excited. They thought that, now the London detective had come, the murderer would soon be dragged from his hiding-place, and handed over to justice. Time, however, went on, and Perkins was still inspecting the premises, while his character was rapidly failing in the opinion of the crowd outside.

"He's no conjurer. I told ye so afore," said one sturdy countryman, who had been a skeptic from the first. And this time his assertion did not meet with the disapprobation it had called forth when pronounced half an hour before. The crowd was tired of waiting.

Perkins, meanwhile, unconscious of hostile criticism, had looked over the kitchen and Mary's bedroom, but without making any discovery. When he came to the Captain's bedroom, he stood in the middle of it, and took a general survey. He then proceeded to the details. He raised the chairs, and then put them down again in their original positions repeating this operation two or three times, and watching with great interest how they fell. Then he came to the bed. He looked at it from all points; first a full view, then a three-quarters, then one side-view, and then the other side-view, till he had exhausted it and the patience of the Inspector. He then stood, and mentally threw himself upon it in such a position as to make the impression which still remained on it. There was some hitch, for he shook his head. He pulled out the drawers and examined the wardrobe of the deceased man. A pair of boots lying in the corner of the room next attracted his attention. He examined them carefully. Something in the lining of one of them seemed to interest him, for he brought out his pocket-book, and referred to something written in it. He then examined the boot again, and seemed satisfied, for he pocketed it.

"Boots, I suppose, are the Captain's?"

"Yes, his servant identifies them," said the Inspector, who was rapidly coming round to the opinion of the crowd outside. What on earth could it matter whether the Captain had two or three pairs of boots? At last Perkins finished his examination of the bedroom, and went down stairs inspecting each stair as he went. These were apparently more satisfactory, for his face brightened considerably, and after he had been shown the traces of blood along the floor of the sitting-room, it had expanded into a broad grin.

"You see how it was done?" asked the Inspector, whose opinion of Perkins had by this time reached the lowest ebb. Perkins smiled; he was not the man to commit himself. He walked to the table, and turned over the books and papers till he found some sheets of blotting-paper. These he examined attentively, holding them in every possible direction. The result seemed to be satisfactory, for he pocketed them.

The footprints in the garden, the half-dug grave under the trees, and the impression in the wet leaves seemed to interest him little. He examined them, but only like one preoccupied with his own thoughts. They came to the river-bank.

"We're dragging the river," said the Inspector, pointing to the two boats which had now been working unsuccessfully for some hours.

"Ah, yes!" said Perkins, as if he thought the necessity o doing so had never struck him.

"The man's a perfect fool," thought the Inspector.

"And now about this Captain," said Perkins, choosing the clearest footprints he could find in the soft mud, and pulling the boot out of his pocket. "His name is Vance, you say. What is he Captain of?"

"Nothing, that I know of, but they do say that he has beeu a Captain in the China trade.

"China!" repeated Perkins, as if the idea of that country gave him exquisite delight.

"Yes," China," repeated the Inspector, gruffly. He was losing all patience; how on earth did such a born idiot ever become a detective?

"What sort of a man was he?"

"Tall, square-built, about forty, gray hair, and no whiskers."

"Deep cut over the right eyebrow," added Perkius, quietly, as he stooped and fitted the boot into the impression.

"Yes, said the Inspector, puzzled at Perkins' knowledge.

"He never went by that name here, did he?" said Perkins, handing the boot to the Inspector, on the liuing of which was written, "A. Compton."

"Never."

He was getting more and more puzzled.

"Compton, alias Watkins, alias Crowder, and now alias Vance; I've wanted him these two years," said Perkins, cheerfully. "I've got him now."

"Yes," said the Inspector, grimly, "he's safe .euough there."

And he jerked his head toward the river.

"Bless you," laughed Perkins, "he's uearer China by this time. He'll die with a rope round his neck yet. It's a plant, man; don't you see he has murdered himself, and bolted with the swag? That room somehow looked queer. It was overdone; too much blood, and too regular. When I found that boot, I thought how it was, and this settled it," said Perkius, pulling the sheets of blotting-paper out of his pocket, and holding them to the Inspector. There, all over them, were the words Cowie, Nabob & Co., in a neat, clerk-like hand, with that peculiar flourish at the end which those who have dealings with that eminent house know so well. That letter to the Balston Bank is a forgery; it's not the first time he has served Cowie, Nabob & Co., this trick. He was in their London couuting-house for five years, came over with a forged character, robbed them to the tune of £2,000, and he bolted. He's been smuggling and thieving all over the world since then. But when's the next train to town? I wouldn't miss him for anything."

Perkins was right. The manager of the Balstou Bank found to his astonishment that Cowie, Nabob & Co, repudiated the letter which purported to bear their signature. It was a forgery. On the following Tuesday, the Captain was arrested at the Londou Docks, as he was booking his passage for Melbourne, and at the next Balston assizes he was tried by the name of Joseph Vance, on a charge of forgery, and seutenced to penal servitude for the term of his natural life. His creditors at Poaktown were the only persons who regretted him.

A SUBURBAN ROMANCE.

WHEN I became the incumbent of the parochial district of St. Barnabas, Copenhagen-lanes, I lodged in Peppermint-place. Peppermint-place was then creeping its way into the fields, with the apparent determination not to stop till it had reached Highgate. The march of brick and mortar had pushed on two ranks of houses, in all conditions, from snug finish to cheerless rooflessness. I went to take rooms in number one, on a drizzling afternoon. My landlord assured me, while extending his arm out of a back window over a landscape in the last stage of damp decay, that the situation was "uncommon cheerful." It displayed a few dismantled garden allotments; a superannuated summer-house despondently lying against a deserted pigsty; bunches of drooping hollyhocks broken down by the weight of their misfortunes; patches of cabbages and other greens sicklied o'er with the pale cast of lime; and tulips struggling up out of beds, between brick-bats, in agonies of strangulation. This uncommonly cheerful situation was finished by a background of damp and ragged hedge; the next mouthful of the green and patient Country to be swallowed by the dense usatiate Town.

The chief attraction from my sitting-room in front of the house was a clayey slough, in which a succession of brick-carts was continually stuck during all the working hours of the day; yet the boundary to this prospect was far from uninviting. Several of the opposite houses were finished and inhabited. The neatest and prettiest of them was that immediately facing my room. If window-curtains were ever made of woven snow, that must have been the material of those at the first-floor window of the modest habitation. There was so much taste in the disposition of the crocuses and snowdrops in the window-sill; such pleasure taken in concealing the wires of the bird-cage in branches of geranium and intertwined primroses, that I was reminded of one of those charming little cottage windows which belong to a French landscape. Nor was this impression weakened when I occasionally espied—but very seldom—between the rows of bobfringe that dangled merrily from the curtains, the face of a lovely brunette, framed in bandeaux of jet hair, and illuminated by a pair of piercing black eyes.

What busy eyes they were! Though I seldom saw them, I could see what they were doing all day long; for, although everything being dark, but the curtains, as if to correspond to them (their owner was in mourning,) I could observe how the little lady in black employed herself behind the film of white muslin. She was incessantly bending over a frame, and I could guess, from the motion of the arm nearest the window, that she embroidered, or did something of that sort, all day long. Now and then the hand appeared to move higher than the frame, and I supposed, from the angle of the elbow, that she was pressing it against her over-wrought eyes. Poor girl! No wonder if they ached; for, from morning till evening, every day, except Sundays, during all that cold and cheerless spring, she w. s to be seen busily at work. Except on Sunday mornings—I suppose to go to church—she never went abroad; and no other living soul was observed in her room.

In the course of months, my observations of the captivating Silhouette—so I had nicknamed the little black profile—were more frequent than polite. The little gauze of mystery which half-veiled her, piqued my curiosity; and I could safely indulge in it, as my draperies were much less aerial than hers. Though the east wind blew with continued iutensity, and it was quite au effort to leave one's fireside, she was never during daylight away from her window. Sometimes I could distinguish that she paused, leant her head on her hand, and gazed earnestly directly under where I sat. Then, as if suddenly caught in the act, she would turn like lightning to her frame, and the little black arm would move up and down with greater rapidity. There was a curious coincident connected with these fits of abstraction and starts of work; they happened inversely to the proceedings of my clever young landlord below (inlayer, carver and cabinet-maker;) for, during the moments of my Silhouette's fascination, his saw, his chisel, his plane, or hammer were in full and noisy operation; and it was exactly at the instant that either of these tools was laid down and the sound ceased, that my little lady resumed her work. I was convinced one morning that this coincident was no mere fancy. Friend Bevil was making sharp, short, lively strokes with his plane. The damsel opposite tracing an embroidery pattern against the glass. The tracing goes on well enough for a while; but, presently, the left haud is lifted to the little head, the tip of the elbow rests against the window-frame, the tracing no longer hangs against the glass by the point of the pencil, and the black eyes pour their rays straight into the window below me. The shavings are still being turned off merrily; but, hark!—the plane suddenly stops!—and see! the piquant little artist has vanished from the window. Presently the plaiuing is continued with a slow aud pensive regularity that makes me feel quite low-spirited.

Although mine was a pastoral as well as an ecclesiastical charge of the St. Barnabas district, and I was bound to watch over my flock, yet it may be said that such close scrutiny of my neighbors as that which I have confessed to, was scarcely dignified; but it must be remembered that what I have here brought together in a short space was spread over several months. The arduous duties of a new district did not admit of much idle window gazing. My church was only a temporary one, and I made it my business to call, in succession, on my parishioners; not only to make myself personally acquainted with each, but to invite them all to worship. I began this mission at home; for, although my landlord's mother was a regular attendant at church, the son never made his appearance within its walls.

Old Mrs. Bevil was a large lady of painfully timid temperament, whose existence was passed in one of the sunken kitchens, and whose mission on earth was apparently to cook glue for the shop, vouchsafing any of the time to be spared between the steaming of the pots, in attendance upon me. One Sunday morning I expressed my regret to her that so excellent and industrious a son should appear to be negligent to his Sabbath duties.

"He isn't!" said Mrs. Bevil, sliding towards the door, and feeling, with a hand outstretched behind her, for the handle.

I should mention that Mrs. Bevil was so much "put out" when spoken to by any one above her in station, that, when you showed symptoms of engaging her in talk, she winced and made artful efforts to escape.

"What church does he go to?"

"French Protestant, sir."

"Indeed! then he is conversant with the French language?"

Mrs. Bevil had by this time found the door-knob, and had turned it. Her confusion was so great that her face—never very pale—glowed like a live coal.

"Of course," I repeated, "as your son attends a French place of worship, he understands French?"

"Yes, sir—French polishing."

I then asked, perhaps rather too abruptly (for I tried to help laughing) if she knew anything of the mysterious youug woman opposite?

Mrs. Bevil curtseyed herself backwards into the opening of the door, and having felt that retreat was practicable, she said "Please, sir; no, sir:" and vanished with the rapidity of a large mouse let out of a cage.

It was not difficult to guess why young Bevil preferred the French church to my own. I had uever doubted that the charming embroideress opposite was a foreigner. She worshipped in a language she understood best; and her admirer—more in obedience to his silent passion than his spiritual professions—followed her thither to worship her. On expatiating to him oue day, however, on the sinfulness of Sabbath-breaking, he partially disarmed me by owning that he had been assiduously learning French in order to understand, and join in the service. I made not the slightest allusion to the Silhouette; for I saw, from his nervous and blushing manner, it was too deep an affair with him to be lightly touched. I ascertained that, although he saw his adored daily, and followed her weekly to church, he had never had courage to speak to her, nor to address her in any way whatever.

My interest in this case deepened daily. I pitied youug Bevil. Supposing, after he had proceeded to the extremity of avowed courtship, his idol should prove a wicked little Freuch coquette, and jilt him? Such a presentiment did not want foundation. Although the Summer had arrived—and warmer, more congenial weather, I never remember—the Silhouette disappeared entirely from behind the fairy curtains. During all the cold weather, wheu she must have shivered while sitting there, she was never absent; but now, when the window is the only endurable part of the room, she is utterly invisible. Is she skilfully maneuvering Love's sensitive telégraph, conscious that she has secured her victim; and now, after the manner of finished coquettes, she leaves him to the throes of despair. Or, does she doubt the truth and ardency of his love, as expressed by his silent watchings of her window, and by his regular church-goings; and does she disappear from his longing, loving looks to lure him quickly to the overt-act—a verbal declaration? If the latter, her tactics will fail. Young Bevil's passion is not a mere flash of romance; it is earnest and practical. He does not stand idly gazing, and sighing, and hoping, and despairing. The more he loves the harder he works. Until he has placed himself in a position to speak to her with confidence as to the future, he will be silent.

Here I am probably asked, how could I know all this? I answer—from substantial evidence. When one sees a man running a race, it is certain that there is, far or near, a goal. Young Bevil raced manfully, and the winning-post he kept in view was matrimony. Early and late his tools were in use. When I first took his lodgings, they were scantily furnished; but the room was rapidly filling; evideutly not for my use and pleasure. The capacious tea-caddy, curiously inlaid and spendidly mounted, did not signify much to me; neither was I ever likely to require the Gothic work-table that I found one evening slid, as if by accident, into a recess; and to what earthly use could a bachelor in lodgings put that frame on swivels, studded all round with cribbage-pegs? Every additiou to the apartments was of the feminine gender. I looked upon these novelties as so many notices to quit; for I did not doubt that the rooms were being quietly prepared for a cherished occupant. This supposition was confirmed, when, curiosity prompting me to examine the work-table, I saw, exquisitely inlaid in cypher on the iuside of the lid, the word "Manette."

All this while, the Silhouette remained obstinately invisible. For a few Sundays she continued to go to church; but so thickly veiled, that a sight of her face was impossible. Still he followed; but refrained from speaking. The time had not come. He would not offer his rough but honest hand while yet without a home to which he could lead her.

Poor Bevil had soon to live on not only in silent, but in sightless despair; the little black profile ceased to appear not only behind her snowy transparencies, but bodily on Sundays. From this time Bevil's intelligent but sad and thoughtful features struck me with pity. I could not but see during my daily gossip with him in passing through the shop, that he was staking his very existence on a cast, which might turn up a deadly blank.

On one occasion, my hopes revived for him. It was towards the close of a lovely Summer's day. The whiteness of the gossamer curtains made them dazzle in the sun. The figure in black approached; and, after a hesitating interval, appeared in distinct outline close behind the gauze. All this while, the sharp cuts of Bevil's chisel were audible in busy succession under me. The Silhouette's eyes only, appeared just above the short curtain, darting a long, devouring gaze upon the toiler; they were red. The chisel goes on chippiug away, without one intermission. I would give a quarter's stipend if Bevil would only be idle for a second, and look up; for, as the gazer strains her eyes upon him, tears pour out of them, and sparkle in the sun like falling diamonds. Presently she disappears. With the anguish, whatever its immediate cause, I felt certain that Bevil was connected.

"Surely this mystery is not im enetrable. I will unravel it." Accordingly, next morning I took our opposite neighbors out of the regular order of visits, called, and questioned the woman who rented the house. I learnt that the girl's name was Manette. She was an orphan; her father, a French teacher, had died recently in a hospital. Her embroidery was fetched and carried to and from the warehouse by my informant's husband. Her industry was extraordinary, and she earned a comfortable subsistence. Lately, she had been ill; something that had altered her face; for she had taken to concealing it. I asked to see her; but was told she admitted no person whatever into her room.

My inquiries. therefore, darkened rather than cleared up the mystery. As I left the house, I observed that my landlord had been watching. He looked wistfully into my face as I passed him on the door-step, and I answered his appeal by desiring him to follow me to my room.

A short conversation proved that all my observations and deductions had been correctly made. He owned everything. It was painful to see a fine, muscular, handsome man, suffused with the shame—honest shame though it was—trembling with the weakness we only expect in young and tender girls. I reasoned with him. I showed him the full risk he ran in nurturing so perfect an ideal out of a mere image. I pointed out the uselessness of his self-imposed penance. She might be all he thought her; she might be everything the reverse. How could he know without some acquaintanceship? It would be madness to give rashly a pledge of matrimony without some probation.

In the end he promised to try and see Manette the following day; and, descending to his shop, worked away harder than ever.

Even now I see Bevil as, next morning, he stands at the door opposite. His lips quiver; but his brow expresses a firm but anxious purpose. The woman who admits him tells him something which surprises and disappoints him. Manette, for the first time for a month, has gone out. The next day was Sunday, and the lover abstained from intruding himself. On the Monday he had as little success. In the evening he consulted me as to what he had better do. Should he write?

I advised him by no means to commit himself in that way; and offered, if he would wait, to use the influence of my cloth to obtain an interview for him. When the morning came, Bevil desired to accompany me. He would, he said, go himself; but would feel comforted and fortified by my presence.

Accordingly we sallied forth across the road at noon the next morning. I would not wait to hear the answer of the landlady; but, pushing by the driver of a spring-cart that had just stopped at the house, went straight up to Manette's door. Bevil followed. I knocked. No answer. Not a sound within. I knocked again, and quietly called her by name. Utter silence. I then tried the door; it yielded, and we entered.

The picture of neatness and prettiness which I had drawn as existing behind the dainty muslin curtains was not realized. It was reversed. The room was in the greatest confusion, and was untenanted. "Why you see, sir," said the woman of the house who had ushered the carter up behind us, Madamselle went away the first thing yesterday morning. She was so weak that she could hardly get into the cab as took her away. She sold her bits of things to the broker (you'll have to get the sofa-bed out o' window, Mr. Bracket,) and never give us no notice in a regular way, (now mind the walls with them saucepans!) leastways not a week's; but my husband never went for to charge her, poor thing, for she was so very petickler; she paid as punctual as the Monday morning cum."

"Has she left her present address?" I asked.

"O dear! no, quite contra-ry. Says she to me, says she—leastways as well as I could understand her French brogue, and she had her handkercher a kivering of her face—'Mrs. Blinkinson,' says she, 'don't,' says she, 'answer no questions as may be asked about me. I am a going,' says she, 'to where I hope nobody may find me out.' And then she pulled the street door to, and I never see no more of her—and never shall."

I looked at Bevil. He gazed round the room slowly, vacantly. The bird was lying at the bottom of its cage—dead. The flowers, no longer tended, were drooping. He stretched forth his trembling hand, and plucked a geranium. He then turned, and, without speaking, descended the stairs. With unsteady gait he entered his own house.

For more than a week I missed the sounds from below. Bevil had shut himself up in his bedroom. His mother now, instead of tending him with glue-pots, was constantly on the stairs with broths, and coffee, and tea, and other sloppy sustenance; but her son would partake of them but very sparingly. I determined to rouse him, and advised that, as he would not or could not work, an active search after the lost damsel was better than stolid, inactive grief. This did rouse him, and he followed my advice.

Weary days and weary weeks were spent in the search. The cunning Silhouette eluded him like an Obre Chinoise. Bevil first addressed himself to the shop for which Manette had worked. The master of it said that he never saw Manette but once, and then she came with specimens of her embroidery, to get work. It was so good that he had employed her ever since, and was both surprised and chagrined at her sudden desertion. He had, through her landlord, offered her a good salary to work at his house, and had hoped she would have accepted it. Her strange disappearance was therefore the more unaccountable.

The clergyman of the French church, when Bevil sought him, was as surprised as her lover, at Manette's absence from service and communion. In the latter he said she was a regular and deeply impressed partaker. He could give no information. Neither could the officers of the hospital, where the girl's father had died in the winter, give him comfort.

"There is nothing for it," I told him one day, "but time and work."

Bevil did, after a time, resume his work; but his tools were taken up and laid down with a slow, intermittent apathy, which showed that the heart and the hands did not go together.

Work, on the contrary, grew so fast on my hands, that I had hardly time for sleep. My successor to the curacy I had left in Southwark was taken ill, and, besides my own duty, I had volunteered to do a part of his. This occasionally consisted in administering consolation to and prayer for the inmates of one of the Borough hospitals.

During one of my visits to the female ward, I was attracted by a few words which fell from the clinical lecturer who was addressing a knot of pupils standing at the bed on a case of tumor of the face. He had. in fact, (warming with his subject,) glided from details of the operation which had been performed and of the after treatment, to an involuntary allusion on the beauty of the patient, which the consequences of the disease and its remedy tended to impair. I got a peep at the damsel between the shoulders of a couple of medical students, and saw just above the bedclothes (which were held up with extreme care to conceal the lower part of the face) a pair of familiar black eyes. They quite thrilled through me. The students were dismissed; and I overheard a sweet voice ask something of the surgeon.

"Don't let it trouble you for one instant," said Mr. Fleam, as he left the bedside; "it will hardly be visible, and, in a week, you will be as well—and almost as pretty—as ever."

I looked again. Those piercing black eyes met mine point-blank. The little head was instantly concealed under the bedclothes.

But that was enough. I felt convinced that Manette was found.

About a month from that date there was joy at No. 1 Peppermint-place. It is November; on one side of my fireplace sit Bevil and Manette. Old Mrs. Bevil has gradually pushed her chair back to the window; and, bit by bit, has nibbled, in her nervous hand, folds of the curtain, until she is completely hidden behind it in that comfortable obscurity in which she alone delights. They had assembled to hear a lecture from me.

"Personal vanity," I began, with all the solemnity to be invoked in the presence of a pair of eyes, which sparkled so brightly with joy, that it seemed impossible for their mistress to school and temper them for the occasion, "the vanity of mere personal comliness had nearly wrecked the happiness of both of you. Because you, Manette, were afflicted with a disease that distorted, for a time, that which you seemed to cherish more than your worldly welfare—your beauty—you sold your worldly goods and deserted your home and means of subsistence, rather than the deformity should be seen by one whom you secretly loved. Had you no confidence in the attractions which never fade, that you depended solely upon those which, despite all your efforts will assuredly pass away?"

"Non," said Manette, lifting her eyes with a sort of timid courage. "He love me only for my face—he 'ad nevare spoken. When he saw and loved my face, it was comme il faut. Eh, bien! if he 'ad seen my face when it was horrib' disfigure, would he not have hate me? Oui."

The end of this, like that of most other romances, was marriage. With marriage, as is well known, all mysteries vanish. Manette's story was this: Her father was a political refugee from the storm of 1848; he had been a staunch Orleanist Deputy in the French Chamber, and had to fly, with his daughter, for his life. In England he taught his native tongue as a means of livelihood, till overtaken by illness. Then Manette practiced an accomplishment she was proficient in, with so much success that she supported her father till his death. She knew the time would come when the family property they possessed near Bordeaux would be restored, and she did not wish to let her situation be known; hence she kept herself a recluse till her terrible sufferings and disappointment drove her to the hospital.

I was not allowed the honor of officiating; the minister of the French Protestant Chapel having been preferred. Of course I was obliged to remove to another lodging.

Passing the shop the other day, I was surprised to find another name over the door. The owner of it told me that Mr. Bevil had gone to live in France, in order to superintend his wife's estate on the Garonne. It appeared, then, that my piquant Silhouette had regained her patrimony. The next holiday I get I shall certainly pay her and her husband a visit. Household Words.

THE BOATSWAIN'S STORY.

THE little Shubrick, a few days out from Valparaiso, was running swiftly along on her way to San Francisco. In the beautiful twilight three or four of us stood round the hatch, smoking and talking. And as the shadows gathered over the smooth sea, and the stars came out, our conversation grew more solemn. We talked of the end that comes to all; of its strange and fearful aspects; of the Black Sea in the war time, and of dead men tossed into its waters by hundreds; of fire and wreck, and the lingering tortures of starvation; and of one who had sailed with us, bright in his youthful strength and hope, but whose grave we had made on a lonely hillside, by the great river of the south. We talked thus and were silent, and then the boatswain told us this story:

On my second voyage to sea I sailed from Greenock in an old ship called the Plover, bound to Valparaiso. The Captain, whose name was Saunders, had sailed out of that port for many years, and nearly all hands came from that vicinity. There was a young fellow aboard, Bill Brown, who was making his first voyage, and was shipped as a boy. His folks kept a public house a little way out of Greenock, and were known by almost everybody. His mother came down to the dock to see him off, and the lad seemed to feel the parting badly; in fact, if it had not been for shame, I believe he would have gone ashore again. However, after we got out, he appeared to like it pretty well, though it never seemed as if he was cut out for the sea. But the ship was a comfortable one, and the Captain was as good a man as I ever sailed with, and as nearly every one on board was acquainted with Bill and his family, he had a much better time than many a young fellow who goes on his first voyage.

We had a good passage to Valparaiso, and after discharging there, the old man concluded to go to Callao, and get a charter to carry home guano from the Chinchas. When we reached Callao we found we would have to lie there some time before going down to the islands to load. Sailors were in great demand at that time, and were getting big wages; but the Captain raised our pay, and we were content to stay by the ship and go home in her.

Bill was all right; he had got to like the life, and was in high spirits at the thought of getting home again before many months, to see his father and mother, and to spend with the girls the silver he would have. Though he had got over his first home-sickness, our delay fretted him, and he was constantly counting the days and months which must pass before he could again stand on Scottish ground.

It was so hot, lying in port, that we had awnings spread fore and aft, and used to eat on deck in preference to the close forecastle. One day we were all sitting in a circle on the topgallant forecastle, eating dinner. Bill was in the centre, cutting off a piece of meat, when of a sudden he dropped his knife and jumped up like mad, his eyes starting from his head, and, shrieking, "My God! my God! my God!" fell to the deck senseless. We raised him up, thinking he had a fit, and chafed his wrists and arms and poured water on his face until he came to. He looked around wildly, and fell to sobbing and crying as though his heart would break. At first he would not speak; but in a little while, when we asked him what was the matter, he said he did not know; he could not tell; but something dreadful had happened at home, and he must go back.

We thought he was wild at first; but he seemed so earnest and so set, that we began to believe there might be something in it more than we understood. As soon as the Captain came aboard, Bill asked his permission to leave and go home on a ship that was to sail for Aberdeen the next day. But, though he begged and prayed, the Captain thought it was only a foolish fancy that would pass off, and wouldn't let him go, until some of us went aft and talked to him, telling him that the boy would surely go clean daft if he staid, when he finally agreed to it. The next day Bill sailed for home, and our good wishes went with him, for we all liked him and wished him well; though many of us feared the boy's notion was right. We talked over the matter a good deal, for it had made a deep impression on us all. You see, he seemed so earnest-like, and the cry he gave would have chilled you through. We were divided in opinion, but most all these Scotch fellows believe in second-sight and ghosts, and such things, and so the greater part thought that something must have happened at home to affect him so. We wrote down the day and hour on the forecastle door, and waited to get back to see what there was in it.

After some delay we got loaded and sailed again for Greenock. We were deep in the water and had a long passsage, but at last reached our port. We were still anxious and curious about Bill, and the first question the mate asked the pilot after he struck the deck was:

"Do you know Saudy Brown, who keeps a public house on—?"

"He was hung last Friday!" said the pilot.

"For what?"

"Why, for the murder of his wife!"

"And Bill, his son?"

"Is in the mad-house!"

It was so. After we left, the old man took to drinking, and in a crazy fit had knocked his wife's brains out with an axe, and when we found the date on which he had done this, and compared it with that we had marked on the forcastle door, they corresponded exactly. H. G.

THE LOVE OF NATURE.

THE love of Nature, if we would prove how long and beautiful it makes existence, must not be left as a mere amusement that can be taken to at any time. Like the love of virtue, it must be commenced in youth. A man may learn a language or a science when he is grown up, but he cannot then learn to love nature. This love he must bring with him from boyhood, when it germinates in all, though with most dried up in earliest leaf. How many who have mildewed and rusted amid the mock pleasures of town, would fain return, when too late, to their first, young love. Doubtless every man carries with him some remnant of his early love for nature, but it is not that deep, animating love which, by its freshness and fulness, keeps the heart green. Vitally to affect us it must grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength. Hence the paramount value in the education of youth, of a love of nature or at least of a fostering of the native taste in the human heart for the poetical contemplatiou of natural objects and phenomena. "Let everything be taught a girl," says one of the most sagacious of educationists, "let everything be taught a girl, and a boy as well, which forms and exercises the habit of attention, and the power of judging things by the eye." Consequently, botany—that inexhaustible, tranquil, ever-interesting science, attaching the mind to nature with bonds of flowers. Especially should this be taught to the children of the poor, whose means of indulgence in costly pleasures are so scanty. There is not a child who does not delight in wild flowers, and whose intelligence cannot be led, if kindly dealt with, to find in botany a pleasure, which of all others requires least outlay of time and money, and is most easily and permanently within reach. It is the forming and strengthening this habit of attention, which stamps so much efficiency on natural history, even in its most prosaic pursuit. When Solomon tells us with al our gettings to "get understanding," it is but another way of saying, "Learn to observe." One of the chief functions, therefore, of the instructor of youth should be to instill and foster this love of nature. A human heart can never grow old if it bring with it, from its childhood, a lively interest in the re appearance of Spring flowers, the habits of birds and insects, and the changing tints of the Autumn leaves. The naturalists' poem is the "Pleasures of Memory" and the "Pleasures of Hope" both in one. He has always a to-morrow to his pleasures; whereas, with most, there is only a yesterday and to-day. Let the young not neglect or despise these sweet pleasures and they will find that when old they will not depart from them. Drill a boy at mere book-lessons, and the chances are that either he becomes a pedant or disgusted with learning and books for the whole of his life after; whereas in using natural history as a lever of education, you secure numberless and most happy opportunities for communicating both knowledge and the taste for it, together with just and amiable sentiments. It is one of the best of mental disciplines.

No mere pastime for the observation and the memory, natural history pursued seriously and connectedly calls for the activity of every faculty of the mind. To take a grass or a fern, and determine in succession its family, genus and species, is in fact an educational exercise little, if at all, inferior to the verification of a theorem of Euclid. Let there be a deep, unsophisticated love of nature, and it will even serve in place of much that is commonly called education. How much grace and dignity does the love of nature give to minds in other respects simple and scantily furnished. There may be no learning, there may be no accomplishments; but if there be a deep, fond love of nature, it compensates measurably for the want of all, and we find a more engaging companionship than in the society of the profoundest scholar who is void of it. People should cultivate this love, and bring up their children in it. if they would but realize the full beauty of the commonest objects of household ornament. Why do not preachers speak more of these things?

If the office of religious teaching be to amend man's heart, surely the study of the works of God, as well as his Word, deserves some little notice and recommendation. The religious contemplation of nature has more efficacy in this way than mere scholastic theologians suppose. "The moral constitution of man," beautifully observes Dr. Moore, "is so intimately in keeping with the outward cosmos, that it is in vain to attempt to regulate our faculties and feelings without respect to the ordinances of God in the material creation."

The pulpit is not the place for lectures on natural history, but neither is it a place for discarding or forgetting it, at least after the manner of the preachers that be. In recommending the love of God to us, how seldom do they refer to those things in which it is most abundantly and immediately shown. They insist much on his giving of bread, raiment and health, (which he gives to all inferior creatures,) but they require us not to thank him for that glory of his works which he has permitted us alone to perceive. They dwell on the duty of self-denial, but they exhibit not the duty of delight. To genuine theology nothing in the world is without significance, nor is anything unfit for citation in its discourses, when it would seek to interpret the word of God and enforce its teachings. The great defect of what is called moral and religious teaching, as ordinarily carried on, is that it contiuually tells us what we are not to do, whereas genuine wisdom begins by giving something to be done and showing how to do it. In its simplest form, if you would keep a child out of mischief, give him some interesting employment. That mankind may become more moral and religious, let those who are anxious for it administer less reproof, and give in place of it an interest in life, show how much there is to live for, and how easily procured.

The love of nature should be cherished for the sake of the tranquility it induces. A man can be of importance to others only when he is himself happy and peaceful, and nothing so much tends to make him so as the contemplation of nature. The serenity we find in the fields and woods and by clear streams, we imbibe into our own hearts, and thus derive from nature itself the very condition of spirit which is needful to the enjoyment of it. Rousseau describing his first experience of this, says: "I wondered to find that inanimate beings should overrule our most violent passions, and despised the impotence of philosophy for having less power over the soul than a succession of liteless objects." It is not the prerogative of a few. Ask any man who has accustomed himself to commune with Nature and he will testify that apart from the intellectual culture attained by scientific acquaintance with its objects—and apart from the admiration of creative skill and goodness which they excite—there is in nature a nameless and subtle influence, analagous to the influence of human beings, and, like that, acting upon us silently and secretly, but most powerfully.

"When the vexations of the world have broken in upon me," says Waterton, "I go away for an hour or two amid the birds of the valley and seldom fail to return with better feelings than when I set out." Why is it, that parents and teachers do not think of this and inculcate it in the children under their care? IRIS.

AN INTELLIGENT FISH.—A white whale or white fish, similar to the one possessed by Mr. Barnum some time since, was captured in the Gulf of St. Lawrence a few years ago, and kept on public exhibition in a water-tank for nearly two years. It was ten feet long and weighed almost 700 pounds, and was of an ashy gray color, nearly uniformly distributed. During his confinement he showed some capacity for education. He was sufficiently well trained to allow himself to be harnessed to a car, in which he drew a young lady around the tank; he learned to recognize his keeper, and would allow himself to be handled by him, and at the proper time would come and put his head out of the water to receive the harness or take food. At times he showed a playful disposition, and amused himself with splashing about in the water; and at other times with tossing stones with his mouth. He often took in his mouth a sturgeon and a small shark which were confined in the same tank, and after playing with them for a while allowed them to go unharmed. An anatomical description of this animal, illustrated by plates, has been contributed to the Boston Society of Natural History, by Dr. Jeffreys Wyman, professor of anatomy at Howard College. The stomach contained a collection of stones, nails, pieces of glass, stones of fruits, half-digested fragments of the flesh, and a few vertebræ of fishes; also other substances, which had been, doubtless, swallowed after entering the tank. The heart, when compared with the size of the animal, was remarkable for its volume and capacity. It was injected, and required thirteen pounds of tallow to fill its cavities.

A METHOD has been discovered in Belgium to obtain a photographic groundwork for oil paintings. Fine canvas or silk, such as is employed for small and delicate works, is used. Simply cover the surface with a preparation of collodion and chloride of silver, and expose it and fix it in the ordinary manner, just as in the case of paper.

"NEPENTHE."

I LIVE as in a dream:
Treading alone life's pathway through the years,
Walking alone—alike, in smiles or tears—
Walking as in a dream.

Ah me! and is it true
So many changing years have all gone by—
So many years—since last I said "Good-bye"
To love and you?

Once, once I deemed
That death alone could still my grief;
That only Heaven would give my soul relief—
So sad life seemed.

Ah, well! 't was better so!
Better we parted in the long years gone;
Better that I should wander on alone,
And bid you go.

For oh, your pathway led
To the dim heights where Fame bestows her wreath,
Mine through sad vales fanned by the fevered breath
Of hopes now dead.

I smile, yet with a sigh,
To think that once, yes, once I loved you so—
Made you my idol—and could feel such woe
To say a last "Good-bye."

But now it all has fled!
No pain stirs in my heart for joys all gone;
Only, a longing for the rest to come—
All else is dead.

"I."

MUSIC AND LAGER BEER.—A great author once said: "Give me a good book, a good cigar, and a good cup of coffee, and I am happy." If anything, this proves that sensual and intellectual pleasures can very well go together. The Europeans have known and practised this maxim for a very long time. The French have many pleasure grounds of high and low degree, where both sexes enjoy themselves by listening to musical performances, while they eat their ice-cream or sip their chocolate The Germans have regular concerts, where pater familias goes with his "frau" and little ones to hear a symphony by Beethoven, a waltz by Strauss or Lanner, and a variety of good and indifferent music, meanwhile consuming an indescribable number of sandwiches or cakes, with the same number of glasses of beer, and, horrible dictu, smoking all the while cigars of a peculiar high flavor. How far the Germans go in this respect may be gathered from the fact that they have established during the Summer months so-called morning concerts, which are vastly patronized, notwithstanding the fact that they commence at six o'clock in the morning. On a fine summer morning you see a caravan of men, women and children trotting on the road toward a surburban garden, where a good orchestra greets them with familiar strains of the works of the great masters. Here, surrounded by flowers and other charms of a pleasant scenery, breathing the fresh, fragrant air, eating much, drinking more, and, alas! smoking the most, they pass their morning hours by paying a heartfelt tribute to nature as well as to art. Strange to say, the Americans, who are as fond of out-door pleasures as any nation in the world, have yet refrained from imitating the good example set by the Germans. They still doubt the propriety of listening to a musical performance and satisfying at the same time the appetite for some more substantial food; they still think it impossible that a man can go with his wife to a public place and hear a fine orchestra while he drinks his glass of beer or wine. The reason for this belief generally put forth by them, is that such places as these are not respectable. We know that the examples set by some pleasure grounds of this kind are not very encouraging. But because there are some low places of amusement, ought there not to be some of high respectability? Ought we not do everything to introduce this new source of healthy enjoyment to our families?—N. Y. Review.

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE has sent to the National Lifeboat Institution £20, accompanied by a gratifying and encouraging letter. She thanked God that He had created so many heroes as those who annually, almost daily, in stormy weather, do His work in the lifeboats "in the face of death." She added that she herself had been so happy as to see, with her own eyes, the noble endurance, "obedience unto death," of an army in which every man was a hero. She hoped God would continue to bless, as He manifestly had blessed, the Lifeboat Institution.

A BURLESQUE poem, in manuscript, is now in circulation in Paris, on the subject of the possibility of a war between the United States and Mexico. The French word for Maximilian's empire is "Mexique," and every one of the two hundred lines of this poem ends in ique. The old saying, that, in France, everything begins and ends with a song, gives occasion to the enemies of Government to infer that the Mexican expedition is drawing to a bad end.

IN THE WRONG BOX AT THE OPERA.

I SERVE my Queen from ten to four,
Where down Pall Mall Dundrearies saunter;
My salary's small—but ah! for more
Some years I must be still a punter!
What chance of marriage for a man,
However careful, close, and thrifty,
Who of three hundred pounds per ann.,
(As fixed on by the Times,) lacks fifty?

My love for Emily 's profound—
Her father, failing in the city,
Died, paying tenpence in the pound,
And left her penniless and pretty.
Her uncle John supports her now,
(I d like to see him in a pond ducked,)
And makes her feel acutely how
Extremely generous is his conduct!

Yet she's with everything supplied,
With all the fashion that is France's—
With flowers and songs, and hacks to ride,
And goes to concerts, drums and dances.
She 's dressed in all that's rich and smart—
Moves in society the foremost—
In fact she 's in the Marriage Mart;
'T is that which makes my heart feel sore most.

I think she loves me! In the Box
When music 's charm is overpowering,
And that young puppy, Albert Knox,
Stands close behind us glum and glowering;
When fond "Amina's" taper burns,
Or sad "Medea's" love 's reviled,
To me for sympathy she turns,
While gentle tears bedew each eyelid.

We mingle sighs for lovers' woes—
We smile to see their bliss made certain;
And so the happy evening goes
Till envious Fate lets fall the curtain.
She'll let me press her hand a bit;
And with me—though her aunt glares finely—
At parties on the stairs she'll sit.
She 's told me that I waltz divinely!

But what 's the use? Heaven save the mark!
Our wooing ne'er can lead to wedlock.
She's poor—and I'm an ill-paid clerk;
Matters would quickly come to dead-lock.
Unions are now secured by rents,
In lieu of those rare perfumes olden
God Hymen's torch sheds ten per cents—
Love's chains are eighteen-carat-golden.

So, she goes her way—I go mine!
Our love is vain, though for the best meant,
And we see clearly, I opine,
That marriage is a mere investment;
And we must let this mad world wag,
And how to Fate's decision ruthless.
Well! I shall wed some wealthy hag—
And she a dotard, rich as toothless! [London Fun.

BURIED ALIVE.

AN OPERATIVE'S STORY, FOUNDED ON THE TERRIBLE CATASTROPHE AT LAWRENCE, MASS., JAN. 10, 1860.

I PROMISED to tell you, did I not, dear Kate? the origin of this scar on my cheek, which you are pleased to say does not injure my looks in the least. I can speak with calmness now of all the events of the dreadful day, on which I received the wound that left this tell-tale mark, although for many months, the slightest allusion to the subject was sufficient to drive the blood from my face and set me shivering from head to foot.

Were I to live to the age of Methusalah I should never forget the occurrences of that day; they are engraven upon my memory too deeply to be effaced while life and reason last. It was on the tenth of January, 1860, at a little before five o'clock, P. M., that the Pemberton Mill, Lawrence, Mass., fell with a fearful crash, burying beneath its ruins hundreds of the unfortunate operatives.

I was an operative in the dressing-room of the Pemberton Mill at that time. I remember that I went to my work on the morning of that memorable day, with a heavy heart and a loitering step. There was a weight upon my spirits which I could not throw aside, though I would not confess as much, even to myself, and had another charged me with the fact I should probably have denied it, stoutly. I may as well tell you, dear Kate, the secret of my depression. Three days before I had quarrelled with my lover, Philip Wardour, parting with him with angry and bitter words, and neither my heart nor my conscience was at rest on the subject. Just as I gained the last of the long flight of stairs, leading to the fifth story of the building, I met my cousin, Charley Dalton, in the passageway. Dear Charley! how vividly I can recall the picture that he presented that wintry morning, as he stood before me, with his great, black eyes sparkling with mischief, his dark curls tossed back from his white forehead, and his brown cheeks flushed with exercise. "See here, coz," he said, catching me by the arm, "I have an account to settle with you, if you please."

"Well, present it then, Master Charley, for you know the old adage, that 'short accounts make long friendships.'"

"What have you been doing to Philip Wardour, Evelyn? Have you jilted him? If you have, you deserve to remain a spinster all your life (old maid isn't polite, is it?) Philip is just the finest fellow that ever sported a moustache, and altogether too good for such a capricious little flirt as you are."

"Thank you for your good opinion," I replied, coldly. "I have nothing to say about Mr. Wardour," and I passed on.

As I entered the dressing-room I felt again the weight at my heart. I loved Philip Wardour, and the breaking of our engagement had been the result of my own hasty temper. I always marvelled what attraction drew him to me at first. I must have been so different from his ideal, for his standard was always a high one. He was of a deep, serious, earnest nature, while I, to all outward appearances, at least, was as sportive and inconstant as a butterfly, brimful of faults, which I took no pains to conceal. But perhaps he saw below the surface, and recognized the latent capability of good in my character. I did not fancy him at first, he was so grave and quiet; and then, too, he never flattered me, as others did, and his language was oftener that of reproof than of approval. But he persisted in his attentions, though they were met with something cooler than indifference on my part, until, by almost imperceptible degrees, he succeeded in establishing an influence over me. Little by little, as I gained a deeper insight into his character, I learned to appreciate his noble and generous qualities, until at length I came to love him with all my heart, and willingly promised to become his wife, only stipulating that our engagement should last a year. The course of our love might have run smooth enough, had we not ourselves blindly cast impediments in its way. I do not think I ever wilfully vexed or annoyed Philip, but I did so carelessly in many ways; for I was thoughtless and fond of admiration, and he—well, I am sure that he never intended to be harsh or unpleasant, but he could not bear to see me lavish smiles on others and accept attentions from them which he thought were due from him alone, and this led to frequent misunderstandings between us.

One evening when Philip was present, an old admirer called on me. On leaving, he gallantly raised my hand to his lips. Philip saw the action, and as soon as my visitor was gone he took me to task for allowing such a liberty. I only laughed at him first, but he was in no mood for jesting, and he accused me of deliberate coquetry. At that charge I lost control of my temper, and retorted by calling him a tyrant, telling him that I had borne his unfounded jealousy until I was heartily tired of it, that I repented having engaged myself to him, and ended by wishing that I had never seen him. In my excitement I said far more than I intended to say—more, indeed, than I was really conscious of, until I saw his pale face and flashing eyes. The sight of his anger recalled me to myself, and fairly frightened me into calmness. It was some moments before he spoke; evidently he waited to obtain complete mastery over his emotions before he trusted himself to answer me. Then he said, in cold, stern tones:

"I shall not stoop to defend myself from the charges you have brought against me, Evelyn. But if you wish to retain either my love or my respect you must retract them all. You say you repent your engagement. It can easily be annulled if you wish it."

Before he had opened his lips, with a sudden revulsion of feeling, I had already repented my hasty and unjustifiable language, and a word or a look of tenderness on his part would have led me to entreat his forgiveness with tears. But my heart hardened again beneath his bitter words, and I said coldly:

"I shall retract nothing, and I am willing to dissolve our engagement at once," and slipping from my finger the ring he had given me, I laid it in his hand.

"So be it," he said, as he received the glittering circlet, and without another word he bowed and withdrew.

The poet has well said that—"to be wroth with one we love doth work like madness in the brain." But mine was a brief madness, for as I listened to Philip Wardour's retreating footsteps, all the anger died out of my heart, and I realized that in my pride and folly I had wrecked my life's happiness. I knew him too well to believe that he would ever return to me unless I humbled myself before him and begged his forgiveness, and pride would not suffer me to do that, however much I might suffer from the estrangement. As I have said, three days had passed since that night, and during that time I had not seen Philip Wardour, nor heard his name, until Charley mentioned it that morning.

My cousin's merry bantering was not calculated to soothe my feelings, and I could have wept as I went to my work, had there been no one to see, I avoided Charley when we left the mill at noon. I could not bear to listen again to his jests on that subject. As I was returning to the mill after dinner, I stepped aside to make way for a gentleman coming from the opposite direction, and as I did so I looked up, and saw that it was Philip Wardour. His dark gray eyes were fixed full on my face, while his own wore its coldest, haughtiest expression. He raised his hat and bowed, without speaking. I felt the hot blood rush in torrents over my face, but I answered his salutation by a slight inclination of the head, and passed on, with my hand pressed furtively against my heart to keep down the heavy throbbing that made me feel sick and faint.

I arrived at the mill before speed was on, and just after I entered the dress-room, Alice Wenzol, one of my room-mates came to me, and linking her arm within mine, drew me into a windowseat.

"Evelyn," she said abruptly, "do you ever have a presentiment of evil?"

"I think not," I replied, "I fancy the organ of marvellousness must be lacking in my head. But why do you ask?"

"Because I have felt all day that something is going to happen, and the impression deepens every hour."

"And have you any idea of the nature of this impending evil?"

"Not the slightest, but I know it is something dreadful, for the shadow of it seems to close round me like the folding of a pall."

She grew pale and shuddered as she spoke.

"Why, Alice!" I said, "I never saw you like this before. I think you must be ill, and it is a physical weakness that produces this strange depression of spirits."

"No: I am perfectly well. But Evelyn, believe it or not as you choose, some fearful event is close at hand. I know not where or on whom the blow will fall, but it will be a dreadful one."

Her tones were so strange, and there was such a strange prophetic look in her eyes as she spoke, that I gazed on her, awe-stricken.

"Well, Alice," I said, after a few moments' pause, "I suppose we cannot avoid our destiny. If danger or death threatens us, our fears will not ward it off." Then I added, in a lower tone, "But you know there is One mighty to save, and you, at least, can trust yourself to Him."

I had touched the right spot, for Alice was a Christian.

"You are right," she said quickly, "nothing that He ordains can happen amiss, and whatever billows of trouble may threaten to overwhelm me, I will still say with confidence 'My Father is at the helm.'"

She left me to go to her work, and I turned to mine. The hours wore on; the afternoon was drawing to a close; daylight had begun to wane as I stood for a moment beside the long window, and looked out on the stars above.

As I turned from the window, I saw that the "third hand" had commenced lighting up. I had nearly reached the frame at which Alice was working, when I stopped short, and stood rooted to the spot with undeniable terror. Cold chills shot through my veins, and my blood seemed turning to ice. In glancing toward the farther end of the room I had seen that the whole northerly wall of the building was in motion, swaying to and fro like a leaf driven by the wind. A single instant, and it fell outward with a terrific crash, letting in the daylight on eyes destined never again to behold it on earth.

Before I could utter the cry that rose to my lips I felt the floor sliding from beneath my feet. I sprang backward with the instinct of self-preservation; then I felt myself sinking down, down, through what seemed an immeasurable abyss of space. Shouts and confused cries were in my ears; bricks and fragments of mortar were falling about my head; something struck heavily against my face, and I knew no more. When consciousness returned it was some minutes before I could determine where I was or what had happened to me. Gradually it was all made plain; I was buried beneath the ruins of the mill. Into this living tomb a single ray of light penetrated. It came from a star far above, peering through a rifted cloud, and finding its way through a chink in the walls of my prison house. Cries and groans were resounding all around me, while overhead I could hear a tumult of voices and the trampling of many feet.

I reclined in a half sitting, half lying posture, with my back wedged against what seemed to be a huge piece of timber. There was excruciating pain in my left arm, which hung motionless at my side. I attempted to raise it, but I found that I had no power over it. I took hold of it with my right hand, and found that the bones were broken and the flesh lacerated. I felt a stinging sensation in my right cheek, which seemed bathed in a clammy fluid. On passing my hand over my face I found it covered with blood, which was dripping down over my neck and shoulder.

With my finger I carefully felt out the wound. It extended from the right temple down the side of the face, passing close to the ear. My long curls were matted together with the clotted gore. With some difficulty I drew my handkerchief from my pocket and wiped away the blood. Then I untied my apron, formed it into a compress with one hand, and applied it to the wound to check the bleeding. This done, I tried to change my position a little, but I found I could not move. Passing my hand downward, I discovered the cause. My lower limbs were wedged between two stout beams, not so as to injure them, but so close as to effectually prevent their withdrawal. I could do nothing but lie still, and wait patiently till succor reached me. Would it reach me in time? It was evident that there were other unfortunates in my vicinity, for I heard groans and exclamations on every side.

One voice sounded so distinctly that I asked:

"Who is lying so near me?"

"It is I—Alice," was the reply. "Are you much injured, Evelyn?"

"My arm is broken. I believe; and you, Alice?"

"I am dying, I think: my breast seems all crushed in. Oh, Evelyn, my warning! the shadow of death has encompassed me all day, and now my moments are numbered."

"Ah, Alice!" I said bitterly, "can you say now 'my Father is at the helm?'"

"Yes, yes, 'though he slay me, yet will I trust in Him.' Evelyn, I cannot talk much, it hurts me so. I shall die before help reaches me; but promise me that if you are saved you will bear my dying message to those I love."

"I promise it, Alice."

"My mother, my crippled sister, you know them both; tell them my last thought was of them; that death had no terrors for me; that my only regret was in leaving them; but God will provide."

Then she gave some directions with regard to the disposal of her effects. The effort had exhausted her, and she relapsed into silence; but presently I heard her murmuring in faint tones, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me." She said but little after that, but occasionlly I could hear her voice in prayer. The hours dragged on, every moment seeming to me an age of misery. I knew that brave hearts and strong hands were working eagerly for our deliverance, but would not the long-delayed help come too late? I endured agonizing pain with my wounded arm and head, and the impossibility of changing my position aggravated my sufferings. But my bodily pain was light in comparison with the mental anguish which tortured me. Should I perish there, who would bear my dying words to those who loved me so well?

A half-stifled cry dissolved the dream, and I awoke to all the horrors of my situation. There was another to whom my heart turned with impassioned yearning in that awful hour. Philip Wardour, must I die without forgiveness? He might have ceased to love me, but his generous heart would not refuse a tribute of regret for my untimely fate. My pride was all gone then. I felt that I alone had been to blame for our estrangement, and he would never know how bitterly I regretted it. Could I only see him once more—only say, "Forgive me, Philip," and meet the gentle, pitying glance that should blot out the remembrance of the look he had given me that day. How could I die in peace with that look branded on my memory?

Alice had been silent for some time; now I heard her voice again. She was trying to sing. I cannot describe my feelings as I heard the familiar strain,

"There is a land of pure delight," etc.

She got as far as the third line of the second verse when her voice broke down entirely.

"Sing it, Evy," she said, faintly, "I cannot go on, the blood chokes me."

I took up the strain where she had left it, and sang it through, my voice gathering strength and clearness as I proceeded. She thanked me feebly at the close. I paused only long enough to regain my breath, and commenced again. For some time the voices of the workmen above me and the sound of their implements had been growing more and more distinct. I could hear the creaking of ropes, and a voice rising above all others, issuing orders in a stentorian voice to those who were at work on them. I hoped that my singing might reach their ears and lead them to the spot where we lay. The tune that I selected was "Coronation." I sang until forced to pause from exhaustion. But, oh joy! I had been successful, for I heard answering cheers and words of encouragement shouted from above.

"Alice! Alice!" I cried joyfully, "we shall be saved! They are making their way down to us."

A faint moaning was the only reply; then she murmured feebly, "Cover me up, mother, I am cold."

Another moment and I caught a quick, gasping breath, followed by a strange gurgling sound; then all was silent. I listened, awe-struck; than I called her name again and again, but no answer was returned. I knew that she lay very near me, at my right side. I put out my hand and pulled and tugged almost madly at the wall of rubbish which separated us, until I loosened a brick and passed my hand through the aperture. It rested on the damp face of a corpse, and I drew it back with horror. Poor Alice! dear, gentle girl, the best-beloved of all my mill-mates. I wept bitterly over her sad fate.

More waiting, longing, praying, patience and courage now; the promised help draws nearer and nearer. I could hear every movement of the men overhead. They were at work on the huge mass of machinery that shut me in.

The light of a lantern glimmered through the little opening above me, and a voice spoke my name:

"Evelyn, Evelyn, is it you?"

That voice, hoarse and strained as it was with the unnatural tension of the speaker's feelings, I knew at once, and answered eagerly.

"It is I, Philip."

"Thank God! Oh, thank God!"

I doubt if ever a more fervent burst of thanksgiving came from the lips of a human being.

"Are you injured?" was the next anxious inquiry.

"A broken arm and a scratch on the face" I answered cheerfully; "but my limbs are wedged down with timbers and I cannot move an inch."

"Courage, darling, we will soon reach you now, but we must proceed with the utmost caution to prevent this mass of ruins from falling in upon you."

I waited patiently, listening to his voice as he gave directions to the workmen, too happy now in the near prospect of escape to heed the pain of my wounds. Others were being rescued all around me. I could hear shouts of joy as here and there one was lifted alive and almost unharmed from the midst of the ruins, and consigned to the arms of anxious friends, and the next moment cries of agony as some crushed and disfigured corpse was recognized by those nearest of kin. At last the huge mass of iron swung slowly around; the cool night air rushed in upon me, and I looked once more on the face of the sky. How my heart bounded at that moment. How the tears of joy and gratitude flooded my eyes.

"Saved, saved!" I ejaculated involuntarily.

Merciful Father! what was the thrilling cry that rang out at that instant, piercing the vault of heaven and making my heart stand still with terror? Fire! fire! The fearful word was caught up and repeated on every side. A few moments of horrible suspense, while the men above worked as for their lives. Then a whirlwind of thick, black, suffocating smoke swept across the opening, nearly stifling me in its folds.

"Back! back for your lives!" shouted a voice above me. "We can do no more. The flames are upon us."

Oh, God! would they leave me to perish thus? Had all deserted me? Not all. One man had swung himself through the opening and stood beside me.

"Come back, Wardour," called his companions. "You cannot save her, you will only sacrifice your own life!"

"So be it then," he replied, almost fiercely. "Courage, Evelyn, darling!" and with the strength of a giant he grappled the stout timbers that held me prisoner, and essayed to lift them from their place. Vain effort. By the red glare of the flames I could see his compressed lips, and his pale face beaded with great drops of perspiration.

"It is useless, Philip," I said. "You cannot help me. Leave me to my fate. Save yourself."

"Child you know not what you say," he answered passionately. "God will give me strength to save you," and he bent again to his task. Oh! the heart rending shrieks of despair! the frantic, unavailing cries for help, for mercy, that rose on the night air as the pitiless fire-fiend sought out his helpless victims. I had rather that my death had been, than hear those sounds again. Nearer and nearer crept the flames—their hot breath already fanned my cheek, when, by an almost superhuman effort of strength, Philip succeeded in raising the heavy beam and releasing my fettered limbs. Hastily raising me up, he uttered an exclamation of horror as he caught sight of my face. I must have been a ghastly-looking object, for my face, hands and dress were dabbled with blood, while my long, curling hair, completely soaked in the crimson fluid, fell in heavy clinging masses over my bosom. There was no time to waste in words, but as I felt his arms around me, I murmured faintly:

"Forgive me, Philip."

His only answer was to strain me closer in his strong clasp. Bearing me in his arms, as though I had been an infant; shielding my face on his breast, he made his way over the burning ruins, through the flames that writhed and hissed around us, darting out their forked, serpent tongues in wrath at the loss of their prey, nor paused until he gained a place of safety. A carriage stood in waiting near by. He was about to lift me into it when two men passed close to us, bearing between them a body just taken from the ruins. The heavy swaying motion showed that life was extinct. I glanced at the white upturned face of the corpse, and beheld my cousin, Charley Dalton. It was too much. I fainted.

When I opened my eyes once more, I found myself enveloped in a white dressing gown, and reclining amidst a mass of snowy pillows and counterpanes. Every trace of blood had been removed from my person, and the wound on my face dressed and bandaged. A woman stood beside the bed, and in the kind, pitying face that bent over me I recognized Mrs. Wardour, Philip's mother. It was to his house that I had been removed. A surgeon was examining my wounded arm, and the agonizing pain caused by his handling of it had restored my senses. Farther back, in the shadow of the curtains, stood Philip. The first words that I heard were spoken by the surgeon.

"Very bad," he said, in answer to some whispered question: "compound fracture; bone broken in two places, and flesh badly lacerated. It will be necessary to amputate the limb."

"No," I said firmly. "Not, at least, till all other means have failed."

I spoke with so much decision that the surgeon peered at me through his spectacles with a look of surprise.

"Absolutely necessary. You would not sacrifice your life rather than lose a limb, would you?"

"I think that both life and limb may be saved," I persisted. Seeing that I was so resolute, he yielded reluctantly, saying that the amputation would have yet to be performed. I set my teeth hard, and bore the torture consequent on setting the broken bones and dressing the wounds without murmur, determined that no weakness on my part should give excuse for the use of the operating knife.

The next day another doctor was called in, and he agreed with the first that amputation seemed to be called for, and would, at least, be the safest way of proceeding. But I steadily refused my consent, even when Philip pleaded earnestly that I would not throw away my life. I had an immovable conviction that the limb might be saved, and I was right, my instincts proving a safer guide than the physicians' judgment. Youth and a strong constitution triumphed. The broken bones re-united and the wounds healed; but I had to endure long days and weeks of suffering first. My nervous system had received a severe shock; the fearful scenes through which I had passed were continually before my eyes, and night after night I would awake, with a scream, from some frightful dream, and starting up with trembling limbs and my brow beaded with the cold drops of terror, would have my fears lulled to rest by the gentle voice and soothing words of Mrs. Wardour. She watched me as though I had been her own child, while Philip showed me all the care and kindness of a brother, providing every comfort, and anticipating every want with thoughtful tenderness; despatching almost daily messages to my friends at home to inform them of my progress, and striving in every way to lighten the tedious hours of confinement. But no word of love ever passed his lips, nor did he ever enter my room except when his mother was present. His silence cost me many bitter tears, for I feared that he had ceased to love me.

I went to my room, and for the rest of the afternoon sat on the sofa by the window, watching the snowflakes as they came sailing lazily through the air; watching them through my tears; for the one thought lay heavy at my heart—I am disfigured for life, and Philip Wardour loves me no longer. Why should I remain to pain him by the sight of my poor changed face?

One day I had sat until twilight began to gather around me; then the door opened, and Philip came softly into the room. He must have been talking with his mother before he entered, for he came directly to the sofa, seated himself at my side, and drawing me tenderly to his bosom kissed my wet eyes and quivering lips. I gave way then, and hiding my face on his shoulders sobbed and grieved like a child. He soothed me by gentle, loving words and caresses, till I grew calm again; then by his questioning he forced me to tell him all that was in my heart.

"And so you were going to leave me, my Evelyn?" he said, when I had confessed all. "Did you think I should give you up? No, darling; when by God's help I snatched you from the very jaws of destruction, I registered a vow that nothing but death should part us again. Do you not know that you are a thousand times dearer to me than ever before? That this scar, which you think so frightful, only makes you more lovely and precious in my eyes, for it reminds me how near I have been to losing my treasure? Oh, the agony of those awful hours, when I believed that you lay dead beneath the ruins of the mill! Do you think, Evelyn, that I have failed to remark the gentleness and patience with which you have borne your sufferings? or that I can ever forgive myself for my harsh and unkind treatment of you at the time of our estrangement, unless you allow me to devote my life to you in future?"

"Oh, Philip!" I said eagerly, "you know I was altogether to blame in that affair—"

But he stopped my protestations with kisses, and then he told me how he had suffered, even as I had done, at that time, and his pride, like mine, had withheld him from seeking a reconciliation.

What need of further details? In a few weeks I returned home, and when I left it again it was as the bride of Philip Wardour. The years have passed happily since then, and I daily bless the gracious providence that has ordered my lot in life. I need scarcely say that I took care to transmit poor Alice Wenzel's dying message to her mother and sister, and they are now numbered among my own and my husband's warmest friends.

As I said before, I can speak calmly now of all the circumstances attending my living burial; but there are two hymns, once favorites of mine, that I never sing now, and when they are sung by the choir of which I am a member, my voice is always silent. They are "Jordan" and "Coronation."

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1865.

THE LATE EDITOR OF THE BULLETIN.

AMONG the list of passengers who were lost on the steamer Brother Jonathan occurs the name of James Nisbet, who has been since 1856 the supervising editor of the San Francisco Bulletin.

Possibly there is no public position as little understood or more frequently misapprehended by the popular understanding than that of the editor of an influential daily newspaper. To the average reader he is simply a myth—"a light that never was on sea or land"—a playful fiction evoked by correspondents, writers, reporters and proprietors. As a bloodless and bodiless phantasy he is considered fair game for sarcasm or invective, and represents to many that popular opinion which everybody affects to despise and which everybody fears. By the more simple he is looked upon as the paper; he is supposed to write the leaders, the theatrical criticisms, the news, even the poetry and the advertisements. He is expected to be personally responsible for an error in any of these departments—let us be charitable in supposing that it is considered an error, and not an intentional mis-statement.

Between this mythical existence on the one hand, and this too practical reality on the other, it may easily be imagined that the position of editor is not a sinecure. If there should chance to lurk a man under this pleasant fiction of the average reader, it is easy to fancy how his sensibilities could be wounded and his feelings outraged; while, on the other hand, if he were not really responsible for police reports and telegraphic errors, some slight idea may be formed of the injustice and embarrassment to which he is daily subjected. To keep a calm and even temper under these difficulties; to refrain from using those weapons of retaliation which his position so temptingly furnishes him; to give audience to indignant subscribers and enthusiastic reformers; to listen to ex parte statements of wrongs and sift the few grains of truth from the chaff of prejudice; to reject communications without rejecting the good will of their authors; to withstand the cajolements of friends and partisans, as well as the threats of opponents and enemies; to be able to decide promptly, and to feel that this decision passes into irrevocable print the next minute; to be expected to give an opinion upon a certain subject in a few hours, and face the abuse of those who have made that subject the especial study of their lives; to do this for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, without weariness, without repining, without relaxing, without recuperation, knowing the reputation or fame of an occasional careless scribbler or correspondent in his own columns will outlive the fame of his own ceaseless labor; knowing that with each issue is folded away so much of his blood, bone, and vital power, and that the throbbings of his presses are "beating funeral marches" to his own grave—these are the duties of a true editor. And these were the labors of the late James Nisbet, of the Bulletin.

As death has robbed him of that impersonality which belonged to his position, it has also enfranchised the pen of one of his humble brethren. In the slight intercourse we had with him, we learned to respect the honest, sincere and manly nature which was hidden beneath his rough exterior and brusque address, and to believe that this outer bur—partly a characteristic of his nationality and partly the result of his peculiar labors and habits of life—was like the nut and the kernel, one of Nature's pleasant surprises. But the earthly shell is broken, and that better part, of which nothing now remains but a grateful memory, is beyond the reach of finite criticism.

THE Fair of the Mechanics' Institute will be opened on Thursday next. On Wednesday night, Mr. Frank Pixley is to give the opening address at Platt's Hall. No admission fee will be charged, and we trust there will be a full attendance. The Pavilion has undergone a complete renovation. The "Old Folks' Kitchen," with its immense fire-place, has been added, and the new wing materially increases the capacity of the building. Mezzara's equestrian statue of Lincoln, twenty feet in height, is to occupy the centre of the building under the dome. Almost an endless variety of articles, from quartz crushers to crotchet-work, are being received for exhibition, and the Executive Committee seem confident that the present Fair will far exceed, in variety and display, all former exhibitions.

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street, for the following new publications:

Miramichi. A story of Miramichi Valley. Boston: Loring.

A semi-religious sensational story. Ada Clare, in the New York Leader, referring to this work as a specimen of the "Railway Library," says: "The story admits of being read to the accompaniment of apples, peanuts, pop corn, pies, cakes, or any of the legitimate luxuries of the railroad train; and besides, if in the hurry of arrival, it happens to be left behind in the car, no heart less tender than that of the immortal Werter would be likely to suffer for its loss. At the same time it is but just to its merits to state that in those country villages where pork is the principal article of luxury, and soda and saleratus those of necessity, it has a right to expect unbounded popularity."

The Gayworthys. A story of Threads and Thrums. Boston: Loring.

A book with the following remarkable preface:

"Of threads and thrums: because a simple story of this mixed, divine and human weaving, we call Life; wherein are threads—lines, lying evenly along the loom, and made secure and perfect with a filling; wherein are also many thrums—ends broken, or dropped midway, or reaching out unfinished lengths beyond the web. Wherein the fabric seems, so often, faulty; where much seems lost, left out, or wrongly joined; where correspondence is delayed, and full-matched beauty missed; where colors are confused; where the pattern, being vast, may never quite unroll to earthly vision; where Patience keeps her foot upon the treadle, and Faith must stand, with fervent eyes, beside the springing shuttle, knowing of breadths that shall be woven by-and-by!"

Candidly confessing that we have not been able to get further than this paragraph except to observe that the first chapter commences with the rather prosaic question, "Did you ever eat strawberry shortcake?" as a kind of practical sequitur to the above, we are unable to give an idea of the merits of the story. The style seems to be ambitious and poetical. Speaking of Spring in the city, we are told that "the churches on Sunday were beautiful with a sort of human blossom time," which possibly may mean that the clothes of the congregation were the antithesis of "seedy." "Earth," further remarks the writer, "lay in her perihelion to heaven." It is but fair to state that the story has a good moral tendency and has been spoken of by a moral writer as follows:

"In these days, when the tendency of society is to educate girls for heartless, aimless, factitious life, a book like this is to be welcomed and gratefully received. Wherever it is read, it will be retained as a thoughtful, suggestive friend."

The Poems of William Mackworth Praed. Two Vols. New York: W. J. Widdleton.

A "blue and gold" edition of Praed, in neat and elegant binding is not only acceptable to the requirements of the social circle, but very pleasantly suggestive of the distinguishing features of this poet of society. If Mr. Praed's verses do not stir the depths of the heart or exalt the imagination to the extent of some others, it is because Mr. Praed's verses are verses of society, and because he is emotional only to that extent to which emotion is proper and decent in polite society. Many of the stanzas contained in this volume are of a kind which might have been written by a clever, elegant young Oxonian, and handed about in MSS. at Lady Cinqbar's soiree, or sent with the compliments of the author to my Lord Farintosh. Mr. Praed's verse is always musical and often tender: his wit is delicate and refined, and his scholarship accurate without being obtrusive. "The Red Fisherman" and "Troubadour" are among the best known and longest poems in the volume, though hardly as characteristic of the poet's talent as some of the smaller and lighter pieces.

Hunted to Death. A story of Love and Adventure. Boston: Loring.

Like Miramichi, this story belongs to the "Railway Literary;" and, like that ravishing work, is written in a style adapted to uncertain intervals of leisure, and blends easily with sandwiches, cigars, pop-corn and irregular conversation. There is no part of the story which the voice of the conductor might break in upon in a way to wound the sensibilities of the reader, nor is there any chapter from which it would not be a relief to "show" one's "ticket." There is a little clap-trap about the title. The process of hunting to death, calculated to thrill the ingenuous reader, does not occur until the end of the story. There is a good deal of kissing in this book, generally attended with unpleasant results; indeed, "Captain George," the hero, is continually getting into difficulties which arise from his inordinate osculatory propensities. A knowledge of this seems even to have dawned upon the author toward the close of the story, as the following would imply:

"Ah! Captain George, will you never learn wisdom? Do you not remember that kiss in the ladies' drawing-room at the St. Nicholas, the misery it caused to yourself, and the untimely fate it brought on one who loved you with as deep a love as ever woman loved man? Alas! poor Coralie! But for that kiss you would not have met your death. And George, you, too, would have been spared many bitter self-reproaches and heart-burnings; and Madeline, too, perhaps you would have been spared many a tear."

Wylder's Hand. A novel. By I. S. Le Fanu. New York: Carleton.

Wylder's Hand is by the author of Uncle Silas, and has received the praise and a dedicatory tribute from Charles Lever. Both novels are of the sensation order. When we state that at the close the dead "Wylder's" withered hand is accidentally exposed to view from beneath an embankment, with a ring stamped with the peculiarly appropriate motto, "Resurgam," we have given as much of this book as our space will allow, and enough to cause any reader of sensation novels to purchase it.

Kilpatrick and our Cavalry. By James Moore, M. D. New York: W. J. Widdleton.

The Life of Kilpatrick is probably the advance guard of a series of military books, based upon the adventures and achievements of the different heroes of the war. If the above is to be considered a fair specimen of the style, we cannot expect that they will add much to the literature of the country. Dr. Moore gives a bald recital of the military incidents connected with the history of the gallant young soldier, and apparently reserves all his rhetoric and fancy for the comparatively trivial details of his social life. Alluding to the delivery of the valedictory at West Point by his hero, the Doctor says:

"The eloquent words of the valedictory died away in the beautiful little chapel, and the attentive and gratified audience had dissolved, some one way, some another; but there was one, the loveliest of her sex, who, more than any other, hung upon the lips of the young orator, and drank in the words of that address with thrilling pride and gratification."

It is unnecessary to add that the "loveliest of her sex" became Mrs Kilpatrick.

Only a Clod. A Novel. By Miss M. E. Braddon. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

Looking Around. A Novel. By A. S. Roe. New York: Carleton.

The Young Lieutenant; or, the Adventures of an Army Officer. A story of the great Rebellion. By Oliver Optic. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

A Son of the Soil. A Novel. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Life, Speeches and Public Services of President Johnson. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

Illustrated Life, Speeches and Martyrdom of President Lincoln. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

On Guard. A Novel. By Annie Thomas. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Theo Leigh. A Novel. By Annie Thomas. New York: Harper & Brothers.

We are indebted to H. H. Bancroft & Co., 609 Montgomery street, for the following:

The Orpheus C. Kerr Papers. Third Series. New York: Carleton.

The third of the series of Orpheus C. Kerr papers exhibits all of the characteristics which have hitherto made these humorous papers so popular. The somewhat indefinite title of "humorist" usually given to writers of this class, hardly does justice to Mr. Newell's talent. As a political satirist, "Orpheus C. Kerr" occupies a position only equalled by the eccentric "Hosea Biglow." In the latter individual, Mr. Lowell has given us a sarcastic and shrewd Yankee commentator on American politics; in the person of Orpheus C. Kerr, Mr. Newell has sketched the sharp, cosmopolitan, many-sided New York "bhoy" in the same character. Orpheus C. Kerr is not as genial or laughter-provoking as Artemus Ward; his broadest caricatures are grotesque rather than funny, there is a latent sincerity and seriousness in even his lightest touches; it is impossible to separate the wholesome indignation inspired by the follies and vices he lashes from the ridiculous atmosphere with which he invests them. But Mr. Newell works with a long aim. Artemus Ward if he make the reader laugh, asks nothing more. Apart from political satires, Orpheus C. Kerr has a keen perception of literary weaknesses and snobbery, and has given one or two clever burlesques of a certain style of sham-sentimental writing of which "Mr. Smith," (published in another column of THE CALIFORNIAN) and "Higgins" are notable examples. As a poet, he is thoughtful, fanciful and refined; a little inclined to imitation, as his best poems—the "Prize Anthems" designed to burlesque the different American bards—abundantly testify.

We have also received from H. H. Bancroft & Co. the following new publications, notices of which are given above:

On Guard, Theo Leigh, Only a Clod, Carey's Record of the Great Rebellion, Son of the Soil, Looking Around, and The Young Lieutenant.

COTTON MILL.—The first cotton mill in California is now in course of construction at Clinton, Alameda county. The building will be 40 by 90 feet, two stories in height, and will contain twenty-five looms. The factory will commence operations early in November. A 200-ton steru-wheel steamboat is being built at the Potrero for the purpose of transporting materials from this city to the factory and bringing back the manufactured goods.

THE SHENANDOAH, AGAIN.

THE pirate Waddell, commanding the Shenandoah, has despatched two vessels from Behrings straits to this port, with the crews of sixteen whalers burned there. Two of the burned vessels—the brig Susan Abagail and the barque Wm. C. Nye—belonged to this city. Notwithstanding this modern Kidd was placed in possession of the San Francisco papers of the 10th of May by the first-named ship, containing the details of the surrender of Johnson's and Dick Taylor's forces, and the general breaking up of the rebellion, he professed to discredit the news, and cowardly and fiendishly continued his destruction of the helpless unarmed whalers, robbing their officers and men of everything of value, and crowding their crews aboard two small vessels, without cooking or sleeping conveniences, and with a scanty supply of clothing; he left them with a recommendation to look out for themselves, and to eat Kanakas if they got short of food, as they had plenty of them. The Gen. Pike arrived on Tuesday with 250 men, the crews of seven burnt vessels, aboard, and the Nile on Wednesday with 142 men, portions of crews of nine burnt vessels. The latter barque reports the fleet thoroughly alarmed and leaving the whaling ground, or penetrating the ice-fields for safety. Subsequent arrivals of lumber vessels from the north report a mysterious steamer bearing a close resemblance in rig and appearance to the pirate, hovering off the entrance of the Straits of Fuca. It is very probable that she has left the northern whaling ground for a new field of operations, and we shall likely hear of her next devastations nearer home. In regard to what should be done in the present exigency, a correspondent writes as follows:

Is it not a burning shame that the pirate Shenandoah should be deliberately annihilating our commerce on the Pacific while vessels able to overtake her and end her infamous career lie at anchor in our harbor? Day after day brings to our port the victims of her depredations and the news of the daily lessening of the number of our ships. And yet not a finger is raised to protect our merchantmen and avenge our honor. What need is there of official authorization to undertake the work of her pursuit? Can not some of our wealthy citizens fit out a steamer and send it in pursuit of her without waiting to hear from Washington? Does any one doubt that any expense incurred for this purpose would be repaid? The Shenandoah is now simply a pirate, unrecognized by any power on earth, and for the work of taking and destroying her no commission is needed. If private enterprise would fit out a vessel, no doubt one of the Government officials would so far stretch red-tape as to place a few guns aboard of her. In this way, even if the pursuit were unsuccessful, we should be spared the mortification of having it said that while a Confederate pirate was ruthlessly destroying everything wearing our flag, there was not public spirit enough in San Francisco to attempt to check her course.

LOSS OF THE BROTHER JONATHAN.

OUR community received one of those terrible shocks which always follow the announcement of a great disaster, by the publication, on Tuesday morning, of a telegraphic dispatch announcing the total loss of the northern-coast steamer Brother Jonathan with nearly all her passengers and crew. The steamer had lately been placed in excellent order, and was officered by men thoroughly acquainted with the dangers and peculiarities of the northern coast, and was deservedly the favorite steamer on that route. For years back immunity from accident on this line had given the public such confidence in it, that no shadow of apprehension as to the result of the passage ever crossed the minds of the voyagers or their friends. Therefore the blow fell with double force, and the shock was much more keenly felt.

The Brother Jonathan was wrecked on Sunday afternoon last, while on her upward trip, about eight or ten miles above Crescent City, by running on a sunken reef that extends out from Point St. George. The Captain of the Sierra Nevada, bound down the coast, reports passing Crescent City at noon the same day, and that he kept a sharp look out for the Jonathan for the purpose of exchanging papers, but saw nothing of her. There was a strong wind and a heavy swell, but neither was violent enough to endanger the safety of the ship's boats if they could have been safely launched. The sea was covered with a light fog, penetrable to the vision for four or five miles to the seaward, and for a mile or two to the landward, growing heavier near shore. The route of the steamers bound up or down the coast, to use a nautical phrase, "hugs the shore," and the inference is that the Jonathan, by a sad miscalculation, had been running too close to the land in the fog, and for that reason was not seen by the Sierra Nevada, which must have passed her two hours before the wreck, and that in place of passing free of Point St. George's reef, the misguided steamer must have struck it, probably with full speed, crushing in her timbers like reeds, and sinking her, as the despatch says, "in forty-five minutes." The first two boats launched swamped alongside of the sinking steamer; the third, a life-boat, was safely freed from the vessel, with seventeen adults—three being women—and three children in her, and reached Crescent City in safety in less than three hours after the wreck occurred. Of all the passengers and crew, those in this boat were alone saved. Boats were immediately dispatched from Crescent City to the scene of the accident, but returned without seeing any vestige of the wreck. The boat which reached the shore was in command of the third officer, and all in it, except the women and children, were either officers, seamen or other employes of the steamer—the strongest commentary on the confusion and desperation that must have ensued on board the unfortunate vessel. The Jonathan had on board an aggregate of nearly two hundred passengers and crew. She was provided with 397 cork-jacket life-preservers, two serf boats and four iron life boats that would hold from thirty to forty persons each; but the great precaution for safety that the Jonathan needed was water-tight compartments dividing her hull, so that in case of its being stove in in any one place but one compartment would be flooded, and the steamer still float. Had the Jonathan been so provided, it is probable that order and confidence would have been maintained after the accident, that the aid so near at hand would have been called in, and that the steamer would have floated until every soul had been rescued.

Among the persons lost were, James Nisbet, editor of the Bulletin; Brigadier General Wright, U. S. A.; Captain Chaddock, U. S. R. S.; Governor Henry, of Washington Territory, and Victor Smith, Government Agent.

AUDIENCES.

I HAVE often found it a relief to transfer my attention from a dull play or a prosy lecture to the audience around me. I cannot say that the result of such observations has always been to impress me with a profound sense of their aggregate discernment or judgment. The conviction usually forced upon me, was, that audiences were at the best, mobs—differing from other mobs in good nature, and in the fact that they have been called together for pleasure instead of business, but, nevertheless, as utterly swayed by prejudice, as deaf to reason, as completely under the dominion of one or two leaders, and as lost to a sense of individual responsibility as any mob that was ever dispersed by grapeshot. I have seen audiences to whom the Riot Act might have properly been read. It is not necessary to get up an alarm of fire in the dress circle of the opera to prove this, and show how speedily an assemblage of dress-coats and opera hats will resolve itself into its original, selfish and unreasoning elements. The most trifling circumstances are sufficient to establish the fact. Yet, if I were to tell intelligent theatre-goers that their position in the parquette or the dress circle transformed them for the time being, from sensible and independent men into fools and cowards, they would consider themselves insulted. If I were to walk up to my friend Fitz Flunk as he has ceased applauding, and leans complacently against the wall, and inform him that he was not expressing his own sentiments but those of Bill Smith in the gallery, simply because Bill was possessed of a louder voice, heavier boots and greater self-assertion, he would look upon me as crazy. What would the readers of this journal say if I were to bribe its musical critic to allow me to displace his regular notice of the opera, wherein he speaks about the "commendation of an appreciative audience" and "tremendous applause," with a notice like the following:

"The Opera House on ——— evening was the scene of a most disgraceful exhibition during the performance of Verdi's magnificent opera of The Marrowbones and Cleavers. At the conclusion of the romanza in the second act, Signor Batti Batti saw fit to favor the audience with a few notes not in the composer's score, which a few ignorant persons in the pit choose to encore. A slight token of dissent from one or two in the dress circle increased this encore to a tumultuous enthusiasm, and Signor Batti Batti was obliged, though bursting with laughter, to repeat the romanza, innovation and all. To render the exhibition more disgraceful, we noticed that the better portion of the audience laughed, and that the few who were justly indignant were evidently restained, by the fear of making themselves prominent, from expressing their sentiments."

The universal criticism of a notice of that kind would be that the writer was hypercritical, and had misunderstood the "generosity" of a San Francisco audience. But what if this generosity lead us to injustice? what if it can be proved that it is owing to this "generosity," or tacit abnegation of the tastes and privileges of the individual members of an audience that the drama deteriorates, or that the standard of taste is lowered, or that sensation plays take the place of Shakspeare? What if I, who, as stated at the beginning of this article, prefer to turn from the spectacle of a stupid play to the more interesting occupation of watching the audience, by foregoing my right to hiss or express disapprobation, become accessory to the reproduction of this piece. Why do I wink at my friend on the opposite side of the house, whom I know participates in my sentiments, instead of openly expressing my feelings. Why do I convey my adverse criticism to my neighbor in a whisper. Surely there is no terrorism that should prevent a frank avowal. The short-haired "rough" in the pit, expresses his delight boisterously, and would, I have no doubt, express his dissatisfaction, should he have occasion so to do, as strongly. Am I to blame the manager or the critic if he fail to appreciate my reserve, and accept the rough's criticism?

It is not only in regard to the intrinsic merits or demerits of a performance that audiences show themselves to be governed by this mob influence. It is felt in the graver question of morals. When some impure god in the gallery sees fit to put an equivocal construction on the words of a pretty actress, and so applauds from the depths of his filthy soul, not only do the more decent—by refraining from outspoken indignation—accept the false construction, but too often encourage it by imbecile smiling. I have seen old Silenas under cover of this mob influence, and solely because he was in a theatre, chuckle audibly in his seat beside a young girl, at an expression which in his own house he would not dared to have noticed. I have seen young ladies, led on by the same unconscious influence, simpering at a dubious sentiment, in a manner that would leave the spectator to suppose they had handed in their modesty with their tickets at the door. In society the refuge from such attacks is insensibility and indifference; in a mixed audience there are always too many self-constituted interpreters. It is the misconstruction and unfair handling of this latest error, which gives to the Gradgrinds and Huntingdons a mischievous weapon in their attacks on the morality of the theatre.

So manifestly unfair is the usual viva voce manner of taking the "sense of the house," that most of the encores are usually given for the benefit of four or five ingenious and selfish individuals, whose strength of lungs and facilities for holding out beyond the usual limit of applause are always successful. The occasion may be singularly inopportune; the prima donna may be exhausted, the opera may be dragging already beyond the usual limit, but no matter, the leader turns over the leaves of his score, and orchestra and singer go back and begin again. I would here remark that these and other spontaneous outbursts are not always an evidence of musical conception. The genuine taste of these gushing enthusiasts who break in upon a scena or the cadenza of a prima donna, to exhibit their foolish appreciation, may be reasonably questioned.

It must be admitted, then, there is something to be said on the other side of the question. A really intelligent and appreciative audience are apt to appear cold and critical. The highest form of approval does not take upon itself vehement outward expression; the best acting, the purest music, the noblest sentiment, do not awaken extravagant and boisterous applause. The audiences who listened to the Keans might have seemed unsympathetic and cold to a casual spectator who had just left the minstrels, although the amount of enjoyment experienced by both audiences might have been equal. But there is something in this placid and correct satisfaction which is apt to chill the spectator—not to speak of the actors—if too long indulged, and the avidity with which a poor pun, or a grimace, or even the contretemps of some unfortunate supernumerary, is seized upon as the pretext for a thoughtless laugh, is an evidence of the weakness of even the best audiences. Some audiences require to be set into approbatory motion, as others require to be retarded in their applause. Who has not felt the akwardness of finding himself a solitary applauder, and the delight at hearing, after a brief interval, a confirmatory echo from other parts of the house? We need not go to France to learn the importance of claquers. A friend, who had faced many critical audiences, once told me that he always found it necessary to throw out some pleasant trifle to the oi polloi, by way of "humanizing" and equalizing his listeners, as well as of warming himself by their contagious laughter. The first laugh—the first applause—the first cheer—is always the most difficult; that done, the rest is easy. Applause is not always spontaneous; a few quick perceptions sieze the point, and there is what the reporters call "a sensation." Then come a few rattling shots, and finally—the volley.

All audiences are alike as all human nature is alike. They are more apt to act upon impulse than deliberation; they find it easier to be led than to lead; to fall in with the current than to oppose it. If this is true of the ordinary business of life it is equally true of the pleasures. Until men shall be thoughtful enough to make even their pleasure subservient to their moral and intellectual advancement, we must not look for decisive judgments from popular audiences. BRET.

CYRUS KIMBALL, of Warner's Ranch, and Geo. Williams, of San Felipe, were brutally murdered, July 28th. Kimball and Williams, accompanied by their families, were on their way to Los Angeles. On the evening of the 27th they camped at the crossing of Santa Ana river, in San Bernardino county, and about six o'clock next morning were attacked by a band of robbers, consisting of five Americans and two Mexicans, who, after killing Kimball and Williams, demanded from the women the money of their husbands. The women handed over about twenty-five hundred dollars to the leader of the band, who then rode off, accompanied by the rest. The Sheriff and a posse left Los Angeles last night in search of this band of murderers, and several other parties are also out hunting them.

THE yacht race between the Mermaid and Restless is to take place on the 13th inst. The match is for $500.

MY OWN FUNERAL.

FROM DE BERANGER.

THIS morning, as in bed I lay,
Half waking and half sleeping,
A score of Loves, immensely gay,
Were round my chamber creeping;
I could not move my hand or head
To ask them what the stir meant;
And "Ah," they cried, "our friend is dead;
Prepare for his interment!"
All whose hearts with mine were blended,
Weep for me! my days are ended!

One drinks my brightest Burgundy,
Without a blush, before me;
One brings a little rosary,
And breathes a blessing o'er me;
One finds my pretty chambermaid,
And courts her in dumb crambo;
Another sees the mutes arrayed
With fife by way of flambeau:
In your feasting and your fêting,
Weep for me! my hearse is waiting.

Was ever such a strange array?
The mourners all are singing;
From all the churches on our way
A merry peal is ringing;
The pall that clothes my cold remains,
Instead of boars and dragons,
Is blazoned o'er with darts and chains,
With lutes, and flowers, and flagons:
Passers-by their beads are shaking!
Weep for me! my grave is making.

And now they let my coffin fall;
And one of them rehearses,
For want of holy ritual,
My own least holy verses:
The sculptor carves a laurel-leaf,
And writes my name and story;
Silent Nature in her grief
Seems dreaming of my glory:
Just as I am made immortal,
Weep for me! they bar the portal.

But Isabel, by accident,
Was wandering by that minute;
She opened that dark monument,
And found her slave within it;
The clergy said the Mass in vain,
The College could not save me;
But life, she swears, returned again
With the first kiss she gave me:
You who deem that life is sorrow,
Weep for me again to-morrow!

TAKING A PRISONER.

PREVIOUS to the celebrated victory of General Wayne over the formidable confederation of Indians, and while the two forces were within a few miles of each other, the American commander sent out two of his scouts, with instructions to bring in a prisoner. Now, as the Indians also kept their vigilant spies constantly hovering on the outskirts of the army, it will be seen that this was an undertaking which, beside the great danger attending it, required on the part of those attempting the feat an unusual amount of skill, daring and coolness in the hour of peril.

Hugh and George Ferrington, two brothers, were the rangers selected for this exciting duty; and not forgetting the other forest heroes, whose connection with this campaign has rendered their names historical, two better spirits could not have been selected. Both were experienced hunters, who had been engaged in affrays with the Indians on the frontier for over a score of years, and each was in the prime of life, lithe and muscular, of unquestioned bravery, and with a fleetness of foot seldom equalled.

It was early in the day that they set out, so that they had plenty of time for the performance of their duty. For several hours they sped as noiselessly as shadows through the forest, when they reached the banks of a comparatively small river. It was upon the opposite side of this that they expected to secure their prisoner.

After consulting for a few moments it was agreed that Hugh should cross the stream and reconnoitre the opposite side, and in case matters looked favorable return to the bank and signal for his brother to join him. If he deemed it advisable to return, he was to do so, and continue the hunt upon the other side.

This much agreed upon, Hugh strapped his rifle to his back, first protecting it in such a manner that the water could not injure the charge, when, striking boldly out, he swam to the opposite shore, striking it just below a high and precipitous bluff. It seems singular that the brothers should have separated in this manner and allowed a broad stream to divide them, when each knew he was in the most dangerous part of the country. What causes influenced them we are unable to tell, but causes they must have had, for it is not to be supposed that two such veteran rangers would have taken such a step unless they possessed good reasons for doing so.

After ascending the river bank Hugh struck into the woods and pursued his way with the most studied stealth and caution. He had gone but little over a furlong when he came upon a solitary Indian, who sat nodding over a small fire. The ranger's heart beat high as his eyes rested upon the savage, and instead of his returning for his comrade he determined to secure him alone.

To assure himself that there was no trap into which he could fall, he made a complete circuit around the fire, the result of which was the certainty that the drowsy Indian was indeed alone. Hugh could have easily shot him, as he sat with his head nodding forward, but his instructions were to bring in a prisoner, and he made his preparations accordingly.

He had shifted his position so as to get behind the savage, and he now commenced approaching him as carefully and stealthily as the panther steals upon his prey. When within a few rods he sank to the earth as the Indian brought his head up with a jerk and made a spasmodic effort to cast off his drowsiness; but the hand of sleep was too heavy, and he succumbed to it and commenced nodding as before.

The ranger arose and resumed his approach as before. He was within fifty feet, when, to his extreme chagrin, he pressed upon a rotten twig, which snapped in two. The Indian instantly became bolt upright, and turned his alarmed gaze behind him. As he saw the crouching form of the ranger he sprang to his feet with a yell, and darted off as fast as his legs could carry him. He ran with such fleetness, and dodged hither and thither behind the trees with such dexterity, that, had the hunter desired to do so, he could not have brought him down with his gun. He therefore made no attempt, but concentrated all his strength in one effort to overtake and capture him.

The occurrences that now took place were certainly curious and unaccountable. The Indian had run a short distance, when, to the surprise of his pursuer, a second one sprang from behind a tree and joined him. A few rods further a third did the same; and finally a fourth one seemed to rise from the ground, and the whole four sped away as if running from a legion of their foes. Four armed Indians fleeing before one white man! It was the easiest thing in the world for them to stop, and taking their position behind the trees cut him off in a few minutes. What, therefore, meant this strange condition of affairs? It certainly could not be fear that caused the savages to run.

"Shoot me, that's a little too much," thought Hugh. "If I keep on, I'll have the whole tribe running before me, and will follow 'em to destruction!"

He halted, turned, and fled himself. Almost at the same moment the Indians became aware of it, and commenced the pursuit, spreading out so as to compel him to run in a straight line. By doing this they hoped to drive him to the river, where they felt sure of capturing him. Great as was the fleetness of the ranger, it was the most he could do to hold his own with his pursuers. It was not until he came within sight of the river that he realized the strait in which he had placed himself. But it was too late to hesitate. He was "outflanked," and could only run directly forward, without turning to the right or left.

On he went straight toward the river. As he reached it, he stopped and waited for his pursuers. In a moment they appeared, when he raised his rifle, shot the foremost, and then, throwing the weapon from him, turned and leaped over the bluffs! The latter were about thirty feet in height, so that he ran little risk of injury from the leap itself. Fortunately, the water was quite deep, and when he touched bottom with his feet it was so lightly that it only served to help him to the surface again. He immediately swam for the opposite shore, and had taken but a stroke or two when the three Indians appeared on the bluff; but they, probably in the expectation of "taking a prisoner," refrained from firing, and, running a short distance down the bank of the stream, plunged in and struck out towards him.

The ranger's struggles were desperate, but the Indians gained rapidly upon him, and, finding that he would be surely overtaken, he seized a floating log, and getting astride of it, drew his knife, prepared to defend himself against them all. Hugh held the weapon so that it could not be seen, and the foremost savage approached him without hesitation, evidently believing him entirely unarmed. As he came up, he placed his hand on the log, and rising half his length out of the water, he made a grasp at the throat of Ferrington. As quick as lightning the knife of the latter was plunged into his throat, and he fell backward and sank out of sight.

By this time the other two had come up, but, seeing the fate of their comrade, held back until they could take him at disadvantage. At this juncture the ranger heard the halloo of his brother on the shore, and called out to him to fire at the head of one of the Indians in the water. He did so, but instead of hitting him, struck and badly wounded the left hand of Hugh himself. Nothing discouraged, the latter called out to him to reload, and to take better aim next time, while he, by menacing his enemies, kept them off from him. The aim this time was careful and deliberate, and was fatal to one of the savages. The remaining one, at this, turned and swam for the shore, while the scout, on account of his disabled hand, was prevented from following him. There being no further danger, he made his way to the shore and joined his brother.

CONVERSATION FOR FIVE MINUTES.

(BEFORE DINNER.)

Bold Somebody (during an awkward silence.) Have you—(to young lady.) Have you ever read Hiawatha?

Young Lady (timidly, feeling that something or other depends upon her reply.) Yes. (Fearing she may be called on for a quotation, adds:) But 'twas a long time ago.

Bold Somebody (leading up to his joke, gently.) The name of the heroine was, as you remember, Minne-haha, the laughing water.

Young Lady (not liking to commit herself.) Well—

Bold Somebody (observing that his conversation is attracting general attention.) I daresay she was called by her savage intimates, Minnie.

A Few People (tittering.) Ha! ha! ha!

Bold Somebody—Well, if a cannibal had eaten this heroine, (every one listening) why would he be like a small portrait?

Young Lady (repeating.) If a cannibal had—what?

Bold Somebody (says it again.)

Young Lady—Ah yes! Is it a riddle?

Bold Somebody (pleasantly.) Yes.

Various People (pretending to have thought over it, and wondering when dinner will be ready.) I don't know.

Lady of the House (politely.) What is the answer, Mr. Somebody?

Bold Somebody (repeating the point.) He would be a small portrait, because he would be a Minne-chewer.

[Curious sensation felt by everybody. Bold Somebody smiles at his boots.

A COOL AND CUNNING SCOUNDREL.—The Vigie de Cherbourg gives the following account of an impudent robbery just committed upon a popular young actress attached to the theatre of that town: "Three nights since, on returning home from the theatre, she found the door of her apartment forced open, and on entering she met a man, who exclaimed, 'Madame you arrive very opportunely. I am one of your neighbors, and having heard a strange noise in your apartment, I was coming down to ascertain the cause, when I saw a man run out and make his escape, leaving your effects in the state you see them.' The artist looked round and perceived that her drawers and boxes had been broken open, and that from one of them a valuable diamond cross had been taken. She then asked the stranger if he would be able to recognize the thief, and as he replied in the affirmative, she begged him to start in pursuit, and, if he could not overtake the fellow, to give a description of him to the police. The man said he would willingly render her that service, had he not to work all night to finish a job which was to give him the means of buying bread for his children the next day. 'How much shall you get for the job?' asked the lady. 'Ten francs,' said the man. 'Well, then,' said she, 'here is a napoleon; so leave your work and help me to recover my cross' The man took the money with seeming reluctance, and hastily departed, having succeeded not only in robbing the lady, but in obtaining a reward to catch the thief. Of course he has not been heard of since."

THE plot of Arrah Na Pogue is of enthralling interest, though exceedingly simple. The heroine's name is properly "Arrah Meelish," but she is called "Arrah na Pogue," (that is, "Arrah of the Kiss,") because of her having conveyed in her mouth a plan of escape to a rebel gentleman in prison, and delivered the paper through the medium of a kiss. The youth is one "Beamish M'Coul," who, at the opening of the play, is concealed in Arrah's cottage, and who, having robbed the Government collector of the rents of his own confiscated estate, gives the bank notes to Arrah as her wedding portion. Poor Arrah is arrested for the guilty possession, when her newly made husband, "Shann-the-Post" takes the guilt upon himself, and is tried and about to be executed for the crime. Meanwhile, Beamish surrenders himself to the Secretary of State, who is so touched with the magnanimity of the Irish character, that he sends a free pardon to all concerned.

ESCAPING FROM A DILEMMA.—A gentleman of wealth and distinction had spent a few days at the residence of a friend, in whose family were several accomplished young ladies, to whom he had shown due attention. As he was about to depart, his hostess proceeded to consult him in a matter which, she alleged, caused her no little distress. "It is reported," said she, that you are to marry my daughter L., and what shall we do?—what shall we say about it?" "Oh," quietly responded the considerate visitor, "just say she refused me!"

The People of the State of California send greeting to FRANCIS ROCKFORD, Defendant. You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and allowing Plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Kate Fossit, for costs of suit, and general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 23d day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

THE Alameda Gazette says the railway in that county will be open from Oakland to Hayward's to-day, (August 5th.)

THE Esmeralda Union gives an account of the murder of Jack Morand by Jack Leary at Whisky Flat, Mono county, Cal., July 22d. The parties had lived together at Owens river, but owing to a disagreement in business matters, Morand not long since removed to Whisky Flat. On the day stated, Leary came to the mouth of the tunnel in which Morand was at work, and called him. Morand, recognizing the voice, and not suspecting any danger, said: "Halloa, Jack, is that you? Come in." Leary declined to go in, but repeated his request to have Morand come out, whereupon the latter came to the mouth of the tunnel, but seeing Leary there with a double-barrelled shotgun, he started to run back into the tunnel, when Leary shot him in the back or side, killing him instantly. Morand was a resident of Aurora for a long time, and was regarded by all who knew him as a very peaceable, quiet and estimable citizen. Leary asserted in extenuation of his crime that Morand had threatened to kill him. The murderer was arrested, but was admitted to bail in the sum of $3,000; the prisoner's recognizance for $2,000 was accepted, and he was permitted to go into the country to procure bondsmen for the remaining $1,000. Naturally enough, he has not since been heard from.

FROM the Territorial Enterprise of August 1st we learn that on Sunday morning last, about four o'clock, a most deplorable accident happened at the Manhattan Mill, Washoe, resulting in the instant death of Joseph Stanton, a young man working in the pan-room. It appears that by some misehance he was caught in the gearing and instantly crushed to death, his body being cut clean in two. He was a most industrious and worthy young man, aged about 21 or 22 years, and his dreadful and untimely death is much lamented by all who knew him. His funeral was attended by all the mill owners and employees of mills in the vicinity. Only about one year ago his brother lost his life in a sawmill in the same neighborhood by a log rolling over him and crushing him to death. This occurred at the Franktown sawmill. The parents of the young man reside at Washoe City.

THE Nevada Transcript of August 1st says a man named Bergen, who is hired by M. C. Taylor as night watch at his foundry at Grass Valley, attempted to shoot his employer on Sunday night last. The circumstances, as we learn them, are these: Bergen was "on a spree," and Taylor thinking him not in a condition to attend to his duties, went to the foundry about 10 o'clock on Sunday night, in company with another man, to relieve him. When they got to the place, Bergen fired one shot. Taylor then made himself known. Bergen replied, "You are the man I want to kill," and fired three more shots. Fortunately none of the shots took effect. Bergen was afterward arrested.

THE Stockton Independent of August 1st, has the following: "The preliminary survey of the Western Pacific Railroad has been completed along one route, between this city and Sacramento, and the engineers are awaiting further orders from Lewis, Chief Engineer of the road. The highest point attained on the line of survey between the two cities is at a point near Liberty, which is thirty-five feet higher than the grade of the streets in Stockton. We are informed by one of the engineers employed in making the survey that there are no heavy excavations to be made at any point along the entire route, and no difficulties to be encountered in the construction of the road but what can be overcome with comparative ease. It is a good, natural route, and when once commenced the work will undoubtedly be pushed rapidly forward."

THE San José Courier says a dreadful murder was committed at New Almaden on Saturday evening, July 29th, by a Californian named Antonio Pinto, stabbing a Chileno whose name could not be learned. It appears that Pinto stabbed the man in the loins with a knife, and by some means cut him half through at the first blow. The second blow severed his body all but the vertebræ. The butchery was described as horrible in the extreme. Officer Bowie, who arrested the murderer, brought him and a young man named Miguel Weeks into San José and lodged them in jail for safe keeping, as the Chilenos were determined to deal out summary vengeance on them.

THE establishment of Z. I. Davis, on Broad street, says the Nevada Transcript of August 2d, was entered on Saturday night and two fine shot guns, valued at fifty dollars each, and two Colt's revolvers, were stolen. The thieves effected an entrance by the rear of the building, and after carefully examining the guns on hand, selected the best and left for parts unknown. They have in all probability taken "the road," and the weapons stolen will be used as an argument to induce travellers to "pungle."

THE miners of Brown's Flat, says the Sonora Democrat of July 29th, continue to experience heavy losses from the depredations of scoundrels who go on the claims at night and rob the sluices. It was thought the killing of the Chinaman on the Martin claim, a few days ago, would stop this business for a while. But the same claim has been visited since by the rascals. Last week two shots were fired at a couple of villains while attempting to rifle the sluices, but they managed to escape, and this week one or two of them have had to make good time off the claims in order to save their worthless lives.

SOME Chinamen found in the ceiling of an old house in the upper part of Yreka, the other day, a purse containing over $300 in gold coin. The last occupant of the house was a Chinawoman who died and was buried by charity. The money probably belonged to her.

THE first nugget of gold discovered in this State is offered for sale by the possessor, J. Weimar, now a resident of Sonoma. It weighs but $4 50, and nothing but the poverty of the one who discovered all this wealth, is the cause of its being offered for sale.

ABOUT five hundred Digger Indians were congregated at Diggertown, on the Jamestown and Montezuma road, in Tuolumne county, last week, having a grand fandango and pow-wow.

A MAN named Howell, who represented himself as having come lately from the East, stole from the cabin of Welch & Co., Indian Hill, about $400 in amalgam. The thief was taken in custody, but broke away and escaped.

ONE of the claims in Alturas District, Sierra county, California, has yielded $150,000 this season, and various others from $10,000 to $20,000.

THE Carson Appeal is informed that R. F. Hunt, Deputy County Assessor of Douglas county, Nevada, had absconded with $300 belonging to that county.

THE editor of the Colusa Sun says he has been at Colusa fifteen years, and has never seen so much sickness at this time of the year as there is at present.

THEATRICAL TALK.

THE Workmen of San Francisco was brought out in fine style at Maguire's Opera House, the scene in the engine shop and the view of the Bay by moonlight being extremely effective. This play as a literary composition is utter trash; Mr. Pauncefort plays the only character which possesses any merit—that of "Mr. Belcourt"—very well, and makes the most of it; Mrs. Sophie Edwin has to do suffering virtue, and does it as well as it possibly can be done. Drunkards are not interesting beings; five drunkards are a heavy weight for a play; the fine scenery, however, made the Workmen of San Francisco draw very good houses during the greater part of the week. It will be played this afternoon and evening. On Monday, Mr. George H. Cocs, the banjoist, will take a benefit, when a varied bill will be offered. Numerous novelties are in rehearsal.

Twelfth Night was quite appreciated by the public, and they showed their good taste by patronizing Wheatleigh's Eureka Theatre during the time it held possession of the stage. On Thursday Schonberg's romantic Irish drama of O'Brian, the Last of His Race was produced to a very good house. This is a well written and cleverly constructed play. A synopsis having appeared in a daily paper it is not worth while to repeat it. Mr. Wheatleigh acted the Whiteboy leader, "Lawrence O'Brian," very finely. Mrs. Fanny Morgan Phelps, as "Ellen O'Brian," a character which did not call for the display of exuberant animal spirits, which gives such a charm to Mrs. Phelps' impersonation of rollicking Scotch and Irish lasses, was subdued and intense. Mr. Leach's impersonation of "Abel Richards," the middleman, is deserving of great praise, his make up was capital and his acting very good. Mr. Percy played two parts, "John Stubbs," a cockney coachman, and "Garvey," a pedlar and informer, with considerable skill; in the latter character he did a very fine bit of acting, when pleading for his life. Miss Gass deserves commendation for her bravery in sacrificing her beauty and appearing as "Mrs. Nancy McRoarkin," a comic old Irishwoman, in which character she drew forth roars of laughter and much applause from the audience. Miss Annie Yeamans achieved a most gratifying success by her execution of an Irish jig, which was unanimously encored; she is undeniably a most accomplished danseuse, and possesses a vein of comic humor. Mr. Myers was of course perfectly at home in an Irish character; his song, "Larry O'Brian," was vociferously applauded and a repetition demanded. Mrs. Judah was a capital old Irish housekeeper. Miss Clarkson was quite sprightly as "Betty." The other characters are mild walking parts, which were sufficiently well filled by Messrs. Thorne, Reeves, Archer and Hamilton, the latter playing an old schoolmaster carefully and well. This piece was in fact capitally played throughout, and deserves to run for many nights. The sensation leap with which it closes, would, I should imagine, apart from the real merit of the play, draw crowds nightly. This attractive piece will be performed this afternoon and evening.

The extravaganza Maximiliano, or Monroe Doctorin' for a Sick Empire, the last and best dramatic work of the author of Enoch Arden, or Under the Palm, and some half dozen successful extravaganzas and farces, has been completed, approved and put in rehearsal. It will be produced on Tuesday or Wednesday next.

Wilson's Mastodon Circus drew an immense crowd on its opening night. Manager Wilson has skimmed the cream of three circus companies to form the present combination. Cook, the clown, has, in addition to the stock of jokes he brought with him, cooked up a choice hash of California comic "colloquisms."

TOUCHSTONE.

A PETROLEUM refining company has been organized in this city, with a capital of $50,000, for the purpose of manufacturing illuminating and lubricating oils from crude petroleum. The works are to be located at North Beach.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

THE present week of the Opera has been the most successful of the season. The combination of the best artists of the two troupes renders the production of operas now being presented to the San Francisco public unprecedented in point of musical excellence and artistic ability. It will probably be many years before our opera patrons will be greeted with a company that will compare in general attractiveness with the present combination. The public seem to have become awakened to this fact, and an opera revival is taking place amongst us as the result of it. Il Trovatore, produced on Monday night, was well attended; and Un Ballo in Maschera, on Wednesday evening, drew an audience that filled both circles of the Academy, and tested the capacity of the treasurer's box—somewhat unused of late to such tests. The benefit of Morelli on Thursday evening, when Faust was produced, was a worthy ovation to the talent and ability of that most excellent artist, whose merit as an actor is equal to his musical cultivation and vocal excellence. Last night Un Ballo in Maschera was repeated. This afternoon Martha will be performed; and on Monday evening I Puritani will be given. On Tuesday evening Signorina Seoncia will have a benefit and produce La Fille du Regiment.

Gottschalk gave a grand piano concert at the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening last. It is reported that he will give his farewell concerts at Platt's Hall during the next week.

THE MORNING STARS.—I had occasion a few weeks since, to take the early train from Providence to Boston, and for this purpose rose at two o'clock in the morning. Everything around was wrapt in darkness, and hushed in silence, broken only by what seemed at that hour the unearthly clank and rush of the train. It was a mild, serene midsummer's night—the sky was without a cloud—the winds were whist. The moon, then in the last quarter, had just risen, and the stars shone with spectral lustre but little effected by her presence. Jupiter, two hours high, was the herald of the day; the Pleiades just above the horizon shed their sweet influence in the east; Lyra sparkled near the zenith; Adromeda veiled her newly-discovered glories from the naked eye in the south; the steady pointers, far beneath the pole, looked meekly up from the depths of the north to their sovereign. Such was the glorious spectacle as I entered the train. As we proceeded, the timid approach of twilight became more perceptible; the intense blue of the sky began to soften, the smaller stars, like little children, went first to rest; the sister-beams of the Pleiades soon melted together; but the bright constellations of the north and west remained unchanged. Steadily the wondrous change went on. Hands of angels, hidden from mortal eyes, shifted the scenery of the heavens; the glories of night dissolved into the glories of the dawn. The blue sky now turned more softly gray; the east begun to kindle. Faint streaks of purple soon blushed along the sky; the whole celestial concave was filled with the overflowing tides of the morning light, which came pouring down from above in one great ocean of radiance; till, at length, as we reached the Blue Hills, a flash of purple fire blazed out from the horizon, and turned the dewy teardrops of flowers and leaf, into rubies and diamonds. In a few moments the everlasting gates of the morning were thrown open, and the Lord of Day, arrayed in glories too severe for the gaze of man, began his course. I do not wonder at the superstition of the ancient Magians, who in the morning of the world went up to the hill-tops of Central Asia, and, ignorant of the true God, adored the most glorious work of his hand. But I am filled with amazement when I am told that in this enlightened age, and in the heart of the Christian world, there are persons who can witness this daily manifestation of the Creator, and yet say in their hearts, "There is no God."—Edward Everett.

STATE INSANE ASYLUM.—At a meeting of the Medical Visitors and Directors of the State Insane Asylum held in Stockton, recently, Dr. G. A. Shurtleff, of San Joaquin county, was elected Resident Physician, and Dr. A. Clark, of El Dorado county, Assistant Physician. The term of office in both cases in four years.

GENERAL ROSECRANS had a very brilliant reception tendered him by our citizens, civic and military, at the Occidental Hotel on Saturday evening last.

THE largest Music House in the North West, having tried every other well known make of Piano Fortes finally settled upon the Bradbury as the best in the country, and thus writes:

"Having tested William B. Bradbury's Pianos in every possible way beside the best Pianos of other makers for months past—tested them in reference to power, purity, evenness, brilliancy, SINGING and SYMPATHETIC QUALITIES OF TONE, delicacy and ELASTICITY OF TOUCH, ease and rapidity of action, STANDING in the excellence of material, elegance of finish, and care of workmanship—we have arrived at the deliberate conviction that they are surpassed in not one respect by the best of all other makes while in some respects they are superior to all others."

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent.	per day on a $50	note.
Two cents	" $100	"
Ten "	" $500	"
20 "	" $1,000	"
$1 "	" $5,000	"

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S
Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

THE FIFTH INDUSTRIAL FAIR
OF THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE
OF SAN FRANCISCO,
TO BE HELD IN THE
MECHANICS' INSTITUTE PAVILION,
IN AUGUST, 1865.

The MECHANICS' INSTITUTE having determined to hold their Fifth Industrial Fair during the coming season, the Executive Committee would respectfully invite all persons desirous of exhibiting Machines, Manufactures, Agricultural Implements, Horticultural Products, Minerals, Ores and Works of Art, to make application immediately, in order that the proper space may be allotted them.

The Exhibition will be opened on THURSDAY, the 10th day of August, at 10 o'clock A. M.

The general management of the Fair is entrusted to an Executive Committee, consisting of the officers of the Institute.

No contracts or agreements will be recognized, unless made by the authorized agents of this committee.

A competent person will be in attendance at the Pavilion to receive and register all goods designed for exhibition, and will receipt therefor.

Contributions of machinery and other articles that require long time to prepare for exhibition, will be received from the 15th of July to the 2d of August.

Articles for exhibition that require large space may be entered on or before the 20th day of July, and space will be allotted to the exhibitor on or before the 21 of August.

The Picture Galleries will be ready for the reception of Pictures, Embroidery, Wax and Fancy Work of all kinds on the 1st of August, when space will be allotted.

The committee will be prepared for the reception of Fruits, Flowers, Agricultural and Horticultural productions, and design to have the tables so arranged that the best display possible can be made in this department; and every effort will be made and care taken to preserve their freshness, so that exhibitors may receive full credit for their productions. Those wishing space on these tables should engage it at an early day. There will be space reserved for additions to this department during the Fair.

The several transportation companies, as on former occasions, have, with commanding liberality, consented to transport articles intended exclusively for exhibition, free of charge, and Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co., in like manner, will take charge of them.

The committee have the fullest confidence that the coming Fair will not only be the most complete and varied in its character, but will also be more attractive than any previous Exhibition of the kind on this coast.

No pains or expense will be spared to give the contributors satisfactory opportunities in the spacious Pavilion of the Institute for the display of their contributions, and to furnish whatever may be necessary to make the Fair an institution where those who frequent it may be pleased and instructed.

All articles forwarded should be labelled, "For the Industrial Fair," San Francisco.

All communications to be addressed to C. S. HIGGINS, Corresponding Secretary.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

MR. SMITH.

[The Orpheus C. Kerr Papers contain the following clever burlesque upon a certain style of feminine literature. It is spoken of as a "small moral tale written by a young woman which lives in Boston and is destined to become an eddycator of mankind:"]

THE first of April. You know the day. A point of time, an unit of twenty-four hours, with a night on each side of it, and the sun laid on top to keep it in its place. You have undoubtedly passed the day in New England at some period of your miserable life. You have felt your coarse nature repulsed, too, when some weary and desolate little child has dreamily pinned a bit of paper to the hindermost verge of the garment men call a coat, and then called the attention of passers-by to your appearance. You have despised that little, weary, hollow-eyed child for it. Beware how you strike that child; for I tell you that the child is the germ of the thing they call man. The germ will develop; it will grow broadly and largely into the full entity of Manhood. In striking the present Child you strike the future Man. Ponder this thought well. Let it fester in your bosom.

"John Smith sat at his table, in the lowest depths of a dreamy coal-mine, and helped himself to some more pork and beans. I know not what there was way down in the black recesses of the man's hidden soul to make him want so much pork and beans. I look into my heart to find an answer to the question, but no answer comes. Providence does not reveal all things to us. Is it not well it should be so?

He was a hard, iron-looking, adamantine man. His eyes were glowing furnaces for the crucibles of thought. You felt that he saw you when he looked at you. His nose was like a red gothic tower built amidst broken angles of sullied snow, and his mouth was the cellar of that tower. His hair was of the sort that resists a comb. You have seen the same sort on the heads of men of great thought. It is the tangled bush in which the goat of Thought loses itself

John Smith hiccupped, as he helped himself to some more pork and beans. He did not notice that the foot which he had semi-consciously placed on a pale, sickly child, was beginning to move. But it did move, and there crawled from under it the shape of a diseased dwarf of womanhood. This timid, pallid thing, uplifted itself to its bleeding feet, and nestled to the side of John Smith.

"Y'o hae been separated by unspeaking space from dis humble leetle place for some hours longer that zis boosom could uncomplainingly indure—y'o have."

The child meant to say, in its coarse, brutal, unlettered way, that the man had been absent too long.

John Smith helped himself to some more pork and beans. He was a man, you know, and could not answer without deep thought. He took his knife and wiped it thoughtfully upon her head, and then sawed off a sickly yellow curl. When he placed that curl on the same plate with the pork and beans, its coils seemed like those of some golden snake.

"Girletta," he said, with the ring of iron in his tones, "why is it that the beasts never want to marry? God made them as He made us; yet they never ask priests to make them slaves to each other."

The sickly little waif cringed closer to that inscrutable great heart which underlaid a soul of eternal questioning. She shuddered like a wounded hog, but could not answer. An inward fever was devouring her.

The man took some more pork and beans. "Girletta," he said, almost fiercely, "the beasts teach me a lesson; but I will not, dare not, SHALL not heed it. I want a home; my heart demands some one to work for me; to support me. I am weary of labor, and want some one to labor and toil and suffer for me, and do my washing. I love you. Have me."

The atom of womanhood contorted her diseased features into the pale twist of agony, and her bosom heaved with stormy wavings, like the side of a tortured and choking brute. Falling to the ground, she writhed, and struggled, and kicked convulsively, as though seized with some inward pang. Then she rose slowly to her shattered little feet, and drew an old cupboard to the middle of the wretched cave and beat her head against it.

It was the child's first taste of that great mystery of perfect love which woman is doomed to share with the thing called Man.

"Yo' air indulging in secret cachinnation, at the expense of my sair heart."

The child meant that he was laughing at her.

John Smith helped himself to some more pork and beans, and sat back in his stern, dark chair. What were his thoughts as he looked down on that miniature fragment of womanly humanity? Perhaps he thought that there might be angels way up in heaven just like her. Bright seraphs, with ruby eyes, and silver wings, and golden harps, and just such pale, haggard, gaunt, sunken, bleared little faces.

"Girletta," he said, "I hereby make thee mine. Take some of these pork and beans."

She fell upon his bosom.

There let us leave them. Do you think they were any less happy, because they were way down in a dreamy, rayless coal-mine, where men work their souls away to give others warmth? If you think so, you have never felt what true love is. Your degraded and starless nature has never had one true soul to lean upon. When you lean upon a soul, you see everything through that soul, which gives its own hue to everything. Man's love is a pane in his bosom, and through that pane the eyes of woman look forth to see the new world. The medium is the ultimatum. God gives us love that we may live more cheaply and happily together than if we were separate. A bread-pudding is richer where there are two hearts, than plum-pudding is to one alone. The world will learn this yet, and then the lion will lie down with the lamb, and even you will be less depraved. The First of April found John Smith unmarried, but it left him nearly wedded. Let us think of this when the spring birds sing again. It will make us more human, more charitable, and fitter to be blest.

As Samyule finished reading this excellent religious tale, my boy, I stole from the tent to meditate in silence upon the terrible revelation of human nature. Are there not dozens of Smiths in this world—ay, even John Smiths? I should think so, my boy—I should think so.

On Friday morning, I went to Accomac, to attend the funeral of a young chap who had finished with delirium tremens, and was deeply affected by the funeral sermon of the Mackerel Chaplain, who had kindly volunteered for the occasion.

Having shaken hands with the parents of deceased, the worthy man commenced the service.

He said that man was born to die. He had known a number of men to die, and believed that death was every man's lot. If our dear brother here could speak, he would say that it was his lot. What was death, after all, but an edict of liberty? Death was the event that set us free, and freedom was a priceless blessing. Political demagogues pretended to believe that certain men should be the slaves of other men, because their skins were a little darker than the others. What a bright argument was this! If dark skins disentitled men to freedom, he (the speaker) could point out more than one Democrat who certainly ought to be a slave. (Great laughter.) Freedom was plainly the condition Providence intended for all men, without regard to color, no matter what Tammany Hall might say to the contrary. It was because we had permitted a violation of this condition in the cases of four millions of fellow-beings, that this terrible war had come upon us. We could only conquer by declaring the slaves, now and forever, FREE! (Tumultuous and enthusiastic applause.) It was the duty of every loyal man to see that this principle was carried out, even as they were about to carry their departed brother out: though it must not be inferred that he meant it should be carried out on beer. (Great laughter.) When we had once settled this matter at home, we could afford to say to John Bull and Louis Napoleon: "Interfere if you dare. We are ready for you both." [Male parent of the deceased—"Why don't you go and fight yourself?"] That gentleman who spoke then, is as bad as the patient who said to the doctor who was recommending some wholesome medicine to him: "Why don't you take it yourself, if it's good?" (Great laughter and applause.) But he would detain them no longer, or the papers would say that he had talked politics.

At the conclusion of this discourse, my boy, the male parent of the deceased offered the following preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, It has pleased an inscrutable and all-wise Providence to free our departed brother from the bonds of life; and

WHEREAS, Freedom is the normal condition of all mankind: therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That we will vote for no man who is not in favor of Universal Liberty, without respect to color.

Passed, unanimously.

Politics, my boy, are, in themselves, a distinct system of life and death; and when we say that a man is politically dead, we mean that even his engraving is forgotten; and that the brick which he carries in his hat is a species of head-stone.

Yours, post obit, ORPHEUS C. KERR.

NATIONAL WIT.—Italian wit is highly dramatic, spontaneous, genial. Among its proverbs are: "The dog earns his living by wagging his tail." "Make yourselves all honey, and the flies will devour it." "The smiles of a pretty woman are the tears of the purse." "He who takes an eel by the tail, or a woman by the tongue, is sure to come off empty-handed." The characteristic of Spanish wit is excessive stateliness. Of their proverbs: "He who has nothing to do, let him buy a ship or marry a wife." "From many children and little bread, good Lord deliver us." "A fool is never a fool unless he knows Latin." French wit is characterized by finesse, brilliancy, dexterity, point, brevity. In repartee the French are unrivalled. Their conversation is not only an art but a fine art. In punning they are unequalled. In no literature are there so many proverbs which speak disparagingly of the fair sex. "Man is fire, woman is tow—the devil comes and blows." "A woman conceals only what she doesn't know."

(For the Californian.)

A TRIP TO MOUNT DAVIDSON.

I WAS suffering terribly from that most intolerable of all complaints, ennui, occasioned probably from the excessive heat of the few preceding days, when a friend made the original suggestion that we should scale the dismal looking height of Mount Davidson. I readily consented, and we fixed upon the following Sunday morning for making the ascent. On the morning specified, we arose about four o'clock A. M.—by no means the most agreeable part of the programme—and dressing as lightly as possible, and arming ourselves with an innocent but tolerably sized pocket-pistol, (vulgo flask) loaded to the muzzle, and a powerful telescope, we started forth on our journey.

Mount Davidson is a rugged, barren looking mountain, forming one of a small range that extends from the Carson Valley northward to the Truckee, and situated eastward of the Sierras. The special height under consideration, lies about a mile to the southwest of Virginia City. It is nearly 10,000 feet above the level of the sea, and being the highest mountain in the State, it is the one usually selected for a trip in order to spy out the beauties of the land. As we started from Gold Hill our course lay, at first, through a narrow, steep, rocky cañon, which leads into a tolerably smooth road, winding round the base of Mount Davidson and two or three of the adjoining hills. This road ultimately leads to Washoe Valley, a small arable space between the eastern base of the Sierras and the small range before described.

This valley contains a small sheet of water called Washoe Lake, and is dotted with several small villages, the principal of which are Washoe and Ophir, the latter quite a picturesque little place. There is comparatively but a small portion of this valley under cultivation, as the lauded proprietors find it more profitable to fell the timber which abounds there, and send it to this portion of the State, where it finds a ready market.

Travelling this road for about two miles, which took us about half a mile to the west of Mount Davidson, we made a sudden detour, and commenced clambering the mountains. There is no regular trail, and here the mountain sides are not very steep. They are thickly covered with sage brush—a short, perennial bush, possessing an odor somewhat resembling sage—the only green thing that is at all plentiful in this part of the country. Every few yards could be seen evidences of the industry of the miner, in the shape of shafts and tunnels, some of the latter having been excavated to the extent of over two hundred feet; but they have all been deserted for the present, as they have all failed to lead to anything like rich quartz. Some of the tunnels have evidently been dug for the purpose of leading water, which trickles in small streams through the wooden ducts which convey it a considerable distance. Within a few hundred feet of the summit, the mountain presents a very rocky appearance, some of the rock looking like what is commonly called bastard quartz. It is still the opinion of many that there is rich ore stowed away in the bowels of this mountain, but that it has not yet been penetrated far enough. How far this is true I leave for time to decide. The ascent here is also much steeper, until it ends in a sharp, rocky point, which is full two hundred feet higher than the summit of any surrounding mountain. Here still stands the flag-staff which was first erected on the occasion of the capture of Richmond, when the "world-renowned" ascended the mountain and hoisted the Stars and Stripes. The party must have had a pretty good lunch, for broken champagne bottles were strewn around quite promiscuously. The flag-staff is grotesquely ornamented with inscriptions, both in verse and prose, some of which are not at all remarkable either for caligraphy or orthography. Having no banner with us, we simply hoisted a pocket-handkerchief and fired one pistol-load, which if it did not sufficiently evince our patriotism, certainly made noise enough.

The view from the summit fully repays the traveller for the labors of the ascent. Immediately below are the towns of Virginia and Gold Hill; towards the south lie American Flat and Silver City, and further on in the same direction is Carson Valley, through which the river of that name flows sluggishly westward into a kind of slough called Carson sink, which has no outlet. Turning the eye eastward we observe the Washoe Valley before mentioned, and behind that the view is shut off by the lowering peaks of the Sierra Nevada. A little to the west of Virginia a rather strange phenomenon greets the eye—the appearance of a small lake, the sheen of whose waters glistens brightly in the sun. But it is merely an arid desert, covering about two square miles. One can scarcely help feeling a thrill of disappointment when convinced of the true nature of the sight, as a lake would certainly be a more agreeable feature.

Resting on the summit of the mount a sufficient time to take our breakfast, consisting of sandwiches and hard-boiled eggs, (who ever heard of a breakfast of an early morning traveller, that did not consist of sandwiches and hard-boiled eggs?) we commenced our descent, on our way managing to manufacture two or three tolerable bouquets of wild flowers.

Altogether such a trip is well worth the time and labor it may cost, and we would advise all who visit Virginia not to leave until they have ascended Mount Davidson.

RARE CHANCE

TO SECURE

DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."
HAMLET—Act III, Scene 2.

THE Bulletin gives the "personel of the two nominating committees." The manner in which it attaches discredit to the names of "the Boys' nomiaatiag committes" is ingenious, if not very dignified. One "keeps a little twopenny cigar store," another "is a good square drinker;" if the Bulletin says a man is a carpenter it does it in such a way that as one reads one imagines there is something wrong in following that vocation. If it knows nothing, either bad or good, about a nomince, "name uot in the Directory" is affixed as sufficient to condemn him. Mr. Langley is accepted as infallible—he has the names of all respectable meu in his Directory. The Bulletin does pretty well, hut it might do better; it says the "Boys' committee are nearly all men occupying unenviable positions in society." It appears to think that a grocery store keeper is an especially unenviable position. Opinions may differ as to whether this is so or not. "Foreman of a Hose Company." Is that an unenviable position? "Porter in the postoffice." Nonsease! More men run for that office than for that of United States Senator. The Bulletin chooses its cases badly. Book-keepers, clerks, "hoss masons," Court Commissioners, all come in for the Bulletin's sneer, as occupying unenviable positions in society. Bah!· That isn't the way to do it. You can injure them much more effectively than that and yet steer clear of incurring a prosecution for libel. This is the way: "John Smith, Esq.—This highly respectable nominee of the Boys' Convention came here from the Eastern States We refrain from inquiring too closely into his reasons for leaving the home of his childhood; suffice it to say he is known; he has been recognized. Is his name Smith? It may be. Tom Jones, Esq.—A nice youug man. Oh, a very nice !youag man. Ask any one "Do you know Jones?" and he will probably answer that he does kuow Jones. Aud this Jones is to be elected member of a County Committee!! John Robinson, Esq.—To waste words on this nominee would he worse than useless; we will only say he is—anotber. Montgomery Smithers, Esq. Is a man te be continually taunted with errors of his youth? We think not. We spare Mr. Montgomery Smithers. He knows to whnt we refer. His youthful errors may be forgiven, forgotten; but he is scareely a fit man to act as member of the County Committee. Simon Stiggers, Esq.—We will say nothing concerning the character of this nominee; we need not, it is too well known." You will observe, Messrs. Editors of the Bulletin, tbat there is absolutely nothing there on which nn action for libel can he founded. There is nothing libellous in saying to a man, "you're anotber;" yon may also say "he's a pretty fellow, he is," and he has no redress. A judicious use of italics and notes of admiration will accomplisb woaders. Be mysterious, as if you knew more than you would like to say; say a littlo, and skilfully couvey tbe impression that worse remains bebind. "But" is a good word to use; if you kuow how to use it effectively it is very strong. "But" and n dash. Thus: "William Jenkins was at one time a man whom we sbonld have cordially endorsed for the position of committeeman, hut—" Oh! there are lots of dodges we could put yon up to. "Was William Jenkins ever in New York? We have reasons for asking this question, but dare not disclose them for fear of doing an irrepurable injury to one who may perhaps be innocent." Next day publish a paragraph stating that your doubts are dispelled. William Jenkins was in New York; then say, "and of sucb men as he, is the Boys Committee composed!" This mode of attack, wbile it has an immense effect, has the advantage of beiag perfectly safe. Make a note of the above, Messrs. Editors. You will find this style much better than calliag men carpenters and boss masons; tbere are numbers of people who think boss masons and carpenters quite respectable, if you do uot. Oh, we had nearly forgotten one important hiut. Dates are good things to make use of; thus: "Conceruing Benjamin Briggs, we have hut to usk one question—how was he employed during the years 1846–47, and does he remember an occurrence which took place during that period of time? Will he continne, recollecting that circumstance, to appear before the public of the city of San Francisco as candidate for a responsible positiou?" Now Benjamin Briggs cannot explain to each of the seven or eight thousand people you address daily that he was engaged in the humble occupation of carrying a hod at the period to which you refer, and isn't ashamed to owa it; and doesn't remember committing aay worse crime than getting fined $20 for whipping n fellow-laborer, who hit him first, and he supposes that is what you mean. Of course you know nothing aad mean nothing; but by this plan you will make a man's conscience conjure up spectres which may be even terrible enough to frighteu him into resigning; then what a triumph is there for you! If you cannot let drive a straight shot at a man's character, shoot a "rover," and you may hit when you least expect it. Be it observed that, though the above advice may appear ironical, we sincerely trust that no roughs may be allowed to have a hand in making nominations, and though we do not like to see a really high class journal like the Bulletin condescend to make use of a form of attack more becoming tbe little Call or the unscrupulous Flag, we shall of course he heartily glad if the rowdy ticket is beaten by the votes of tbe respectable portion of tbe community.

I CALLED to see her—she on whom
My beart and hopes are set—
Whether my hopes will bo fulfilled
Alas! I know not yet.

I thought she loved me. As her hand
Sbe gently placed in mine,
A rosy blush suffused her face—
Thut face I think divine.

"Why hlush?" I murmnred, sure that I Could now n conquest boast;
"I ain't a blushing," she replied,
"I've just been making toast."

IF a young and inexperienced actor commits a faux pas on the stage the critics of tbe daily press do not fear to rebuke bim sternly. Wby did they pass over, without comment, an offeuce, not ouly against the etiquette of the stage, but a positive insult to a prima donna, committed by one who cannot plead inexperience and youth in extenuation? During the performance of the opera of La Figlia del Reggimento, on tbe occasioa of Signorina Sconcia's benefit, Signor Morelli did what would assuredly have called forth a storm of hisses from any audience save one composed of good-natured San Franciscans, who applaud hut never biss. Signor Morelli actually took occasion to attempt to divert the attention of the audience from tbo siager and raise a laugh! While Signorina Sconcia was singing the plaintive farewell, a bouquet heing thrown, which fell near Siguor Morelli, he started back gesticulating and rubbing his aose like a clown in a pantomime; this be did like those of whom Hamlet speaks, as laugbing:

"To set on some quantity of harren spectators to laugb too; though in the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to he considered; that's villainous, aad shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it."

Signor Morelli could fiud no more honorable occasion on which to exert himself to the utmost than the benefit of so painstaking aad accomplished an artiste as Signorina Olivia Sconcia, he, however, preferred rather to make a spectacle of himself, whieh caused his many admirers to feel sorry for him.

WE are so much flattered by the following note that we must make a desperate attempt to comply with "A Subscriber, G. & L.'s" request.

Editor "Mouse-Trap," Californian.—Mr. Editor: I was going down Montgomery street last evening. I met a gentleman holding his sides, and asked him what was the matter. He said: "I've got a pain in my side." A wag standiag by, said be thought be had monkey (monk) on tbe beart." Please define tbat expression and oblige a SUBSCRIBER, G. & L.

"Editor Monse-Trap!" Thnt's what tickled our vanity, and made us engage in this arduous undertaking. Had we heen called tbe "Moase-Trap Mnn" we should have passed over this communication with silent contempt; but "A Subscriber, G. & L." has a just conception of what the "Mouse-Trap" is—that wbat the opinions of the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN may he is naught to us, we edit the "Mouse-Trap." Witb the honors attendant on tbe position, we accept its responsibilities, one of which is answering correspondents. Now to our task. Given: A gentleman holdiag his sides, a pedestrian and a man wbo says he thinks the gentleman holding his sides "has monkey, (monk) on the heart." Required: To prove the lust named a "wag." Tbat is tbe proposition, we believe. The heart is popularly supposed to be the seat of love; love is, therefore, an affection of the beart, tbe "wag" accused the gentleman of having an affection of the heart, namely, "monkey on the heart." The Italian for "monkey" is "monicchio." "Monna" in Italian signifies "monkey," and also "mistress," heing a contraction of "madonna." The "wag" knew that in Italian the same word stood for "monkey" and "mistress," and by saying that the gentleman holding his sides bad "monkey on the heart," meant to imply that his heart was affected by thoughts of his mistress—otherwise that he was in love; therefore he was a wag.
Q. E. D.

"A CORRESPONDENT of the Bulletin" furnishes an account of "tbe exccution of Lincolu's assassins," "last scenes," etc. This gentleman ought really to he promoted to the position of "our own correspondent;" he wields a most powerful pen. Of Mrs. Surratt be says:

Mrs. Surratt was a very remarkable woman, and like most remarkable women, had an undertone of superstition which served her in place of true religion, and enabled her to sleep peacefully even while cognizant of such a crime as that for which she has now suffered.

Farther on in his letter he appears to forget that Mrs. Surratt had only "an undertoae of superstition in place of true religion," and says:

"She desired to see her spiritual advisers, and they were sent for. The sacred veil of ghostly comfort should not he rudely rent nor lightly lifted, but we may state with entire propriety that the miserable woman expressed the most emphatic desire for prayer and boly consolation."

This correspondent has furaished the Bulletin with a most superior article in the way of a sensation letter. The "sacred veil of ghostly comfort" is good, hat what follows is suhlime:

"She for a moment forgot the Surratt in the womau, and felt the keenness of her position. Fainting, she cried aloud in the bitterness of ber woe; wailing forth great waves of sorrow, she fell upon the floor and guve vent to a paroxysm of grief, partially hysterical and wholly nervous."

Of Miss Surratt, after describing her untiring efforts to obtaiu a respite for her mother, and the agony she suffered when she found them unavailing, he says she communicated the fact to her sentenced mother:

"And as she hent her head upon her neck she bathed her shoulders with tears of unfeigned grief and sympathy."

No doubt he thought "unfeigned" sounded well in that place, and therefore used it. This letter "from a correspondent of the Bulletin" is a remarkably fine specimen of penny-a-lining, full of high sounding words, many of them sadly misplaced. George A. Atzerott is disposed of in very few words: after saying that he was ill-tempered, had no appetite, and could not sleep, the correspondent sums him up thus:

"He was a poor, miserable fellow, and his death amounted to no more than did his life."

We presume he means that his death amounted to nothing in a penny-a-liuing point of view, as he afterwards says "his agouy was of short duratiou." He is evideatly disappointed that "his death amounted to no more than did his life." No one hut a penny-a-liner would be unreasouable enough to expect a mau's death to amouut to more than his life, hut he thiuks if a man has, during his whole lifetime never done aay deed which would furnish a paragraph to the newspapers, the least he can do when he comes to be hanged is to make a sensational end which will give an opportunity to use the sensation heading, "Fearful Scene on the Scnfiold." "A correspoadent of the Bulletin" has dono remarkably well consideriug the material he had. We wish, however, he had had sufficient knowledge of the power of words to he aware bow grimly ludicrous is the following sentence describing Atzerott:

"He, also, was assisted by two soldiers, and seemed very feeble, hut appeared to rnlly when on the scaffold, and took an evident interest in the proceedings."

BARNUM'S MUSEUM has been burned to the ground. Probably it was fully insured and the euterprising proprietor suffers no pecuniary loss. His agent received immediate orders to proceed to Europe, where he will no doubt have curiosities manufactured for another museum. While the account received here of the scene at the fire reflects great discredit on the police of New York, who instead of erecting barriers to keep off the mob, allowed the stores in the vicinity to be broken into and pillaged, it is in some respects humorous. The American Giantess, Jeff Davis, (in wax,) the bear and the learned seal appear to have heen the only curiosities rescued. The American Giantess lost her head from frigbt and swooned; Jeff. Davis lost his head from the heat, and it was afterwards fouud, hung to a lamp-post by some irreverent wretch, who had no respect for the head of the late C. S. A. The learned seal behaved like an idiot, and resisted those who tried to rescue him; the hear, more prudent, convinced that it was neck or nothing with him, submitted to be let down from a window by his neck. Barnum will very soon have another museum. All is not lost; he bas a tame hear, a learned seal, the head of Joff Davis, and the American Giantess to begin with.

MINNIGISSENGEN.

"YOUR Serene Highness must not forget that the eyes of Europe are upon us!" exclaimed the Baron Von Rrobrecht, Prime Minister, Commander of the Forces, Privy Councillor, and Minister of Foreign Affairs of the principality of Hess Minnigissengen.

"But, my dear Baron," returned the Prince, pointing out the passage, "my cousin's letter expressly states that his visit is to be without ceremony."

The Baron Von Brobrecht promdly drew himself up to his full height. It being a court-day, he was in full dress; for the Reception—which lasted exactly eight minutes—was just over. The display upon the Baron's small round person, would have led a stranger to believe that, in him, were concentrated the highest honors of the greatest realm in Europe. His coat was stiff with embroidery; and, would have been, but for the dimming ravages of Time, gorgeous with gold; it was fastened at the waist with a rainbow of sashes, girdles, and lace; while a grotesque menagerie of honorific animals dangled at his breast. Having expanded his person to its utmost dimensions to give the greater impressiveness to his arguments, he proceeded to say: "Your Highness will permit me to observe, that, in this affair, your Highness's consequence and consideration, in the eyes of foreign courts, are in question. When I had the honor to be attached to the person of his Serene Highness the late Prince your beloved father, we were, under similar circumstances, accustomed to spare no expense."

"Very true; but you must not forget that under those similar circumstances you were obliged to pledge, to the Jews, the diamonds of her Serene Highness the late Princess my beloved mother."

"But, then," interrupted the First Minister, eagerly, "we enjoyed, amongst the neighboring principalities, the reputation of being the most polished and elegant court in Germany. And," persisted the Baron, "to what did we owe your illustrious predecessor's marriage, which brought him a revenue of ten thousand florins? Why, to the magnificence of his court when your august uncle visited it. Dazzled by his brilliant reception, the Grand-Duke of Saxe Kissankumagen bestowed on us his sister in marriage."

At the word "marriage" the Prince sighed, and said, abstractedly, "Well, Baron; receive my cousin as you think best;" then sighed again, and was soon plunged into a reverie.

"Nine of the palace servants must have new liveries," said Rrobrecht, commencing his arrangements. "Your Serene Highness will excuse my absence. I must hasten to the tailor."

That announcement suddenly aroused the royal dreamer.

"To the tailor?" he echoed.

"To the tailor," repeated the functionary.

"Then I will accompany you."

Popularity was thought at that time—to the great discomfort of that thorough absolutist, the Baron Von Rrobrecht—to be a necessary policy of the crown of Hesse Minnigissengen. Revolution was stalking rapidly over Germany; and it was essential that the prince should become familiar with his people. This was not difficult; for his capital consisted of seventy-eight houses, and a population that did not exceed three hundred and two souls, ten per cent. of whom were babies in arms.

The tailor's house was, beyond contradiction, the prettiest dwelling in Minnigissenbourgh; it was approached by a quadruple row of acacias, which were then in full bloom. Under these trees his Serene Higness expressed his intention of taking "a turn," while his Prime Minister entered the house to negotiate the transaction in liveries.

"The business I have come upon is this," said Rrobrecht to Herr Hubert Oberschneider; "we require fifteen new state liveries, complete, by the end of the week."

"Impossible!" said the tailor, dryly.

"Nevertheless," rejoined the Baron haughtily, "we must have them. His Serene Highness's cousin, his Royal Highness the Prince of Saxe Kissankumagen, is about to pay us a visit."

"I, too, am expecting a visitor," rejoined the tailor; "my nephew; and the two or three first days after his arrival are destined to merry-making. No work will be done."

"So!" exclaimed Rrobrecht, with severity. "These are the fruits of that excessive familiarity with which his Highness indulges his subjects. It renders them impertinent."

Mr. Oberschneider lit his pipe. "Baron Rrobrecht," he said, with great composure, "you have the option of giving the Prince's custom to any other tailor you please; I do not seek it; I do not even demand payment of my little bill of four hundred and odd florins. Thank Heaven, I am not in need of them at present. But," continued the tailor, "why do you require fifteen suits, since you have only nine domestics at the palace; one of whom is bed ridden?"

"Because," replied Rrobrecht, "we are going, provisionally, to double the number of our retainers." As the tailor went on smoking his pipe, with an irreverent indifference which betokened obstinacy, the Baron found a mollifying tone expedient. "Come, good Master Hubert," he coaxed, "do this for the Prince, and we will not quarrel about price."

"I am hourly expecting my nephew," was the tailor's next remark. "He is coming from Paris after having completed his studies at Gottingen. He is a young man who, to judge by the money he has cost me, must be a wonderful genius. I cannot think of your fifteen suits; all that I can do is to lend his Highness my people's clothes. My nephew, I dare say, will not care about being received in grand liveries."

The Baron groaned inwardly. "I must," he thought, "lower our dignity before this miserable tailor's money bags!" The Minister of State then tapped his snuff-box, and cogitated profoundly. At length he caught an idea. "You will change the collars and facings to our color?" he asked.

"Willingly;" and Master Hubert held out his hand to the Baron, for the purpose of clinching the bargain. The latter, though deeply shocked at this familiarity, thought it better, under present circumstances, to swallow his resentment; and, exerting a gentle violence over his pride, he mildly shook the outstretched digits of the independent tailor.

"Ah!" thought Rrobrecht, as he proceeded to rejoin the Prince. "If I could only persuade his Higness to create some sort of income or property-tax, we should soon pull down the pride of these moneyed gentlemen."

As he advanced under the acacias, Rrobrecht discovered that the Prince was not alone. He was too discreet a courtier to interrupt a tete-á-tete, and bent his steps where numerous and pressing engagements required his presence. The sex and beauty of the Prince's companion explained, perhaps, the eagerness with which his Highness accompanied his Minister to the spot. He was long in quitting it. For more than an hour he and Albertina, the tailor's daughter, paced the avenue.

Early on the morning of the day appointed for their visitor's arrival, the Baron Von Rrobrecht, magnificently attired, and glittering in the effulgence of all his orders, presented for the Prince's signature a closely written parchment; it was the royal consent to the sale of a farm.

"The means are violent, I must admit," said Rrobrecht; "but, then, our peculiar position demands the sacrifice. We shall thus be enabled to receive your august cousin (although travelling in modest incognito) with proper pomp and splendor."

The Prince signed without reading.

About eleven o'clock in the forenoon, Rrobrecht again made his appearance, to announce that some peasant had seen a horseman of distingnished mien, but evidently travelling incognito, enter the inn at Zweibruken, on the frontiers—about a quarter of a league distant—having previously inquired his way to Minnigissenbourgh.

The Prince mounted his charger, and set off to meet the visitor, accompanied by Rrobrecht, the soldiery, and the band. To tell the truth, his Serene Highness was delighted at getting away from home for a short time, under whatever pretext; for, during the last two or three days, all had been at sixes and sevens in the palace. His own valet had been metamorphosed by the Baron into a sort of grand chamberlain. A horrible noise of hammering rendered the place unbearable. All the old state-rooms had been furbished up with the furniture which but scantily garnished the private apartments.

As they approached the frontier, they beheld a cloud of dust. Rrobrecht drew up his forces in open order, and the band began to tune their instruments; but it was only the postman who trotted by without stopping. The Prince, it should be mentioned here, was an amateur, and, out of the seventy men of which his army consisted, forty-five were musicians. In a few minutes a denser cloud of dust appeared, and rapidly increased in volume and propinquity. Rrobrecht gave the signal, and the band struck up Spontini's marche triomphale.

Then there issued from the cloud a horse covered with foam. A figure was seated on it, clad precisely in the way in which a peasant would suppose noblemen go about. The costume was ultra-fashionable and gaudy; consisting partly of the dress of the German students, and partly of that of the young Parisian exquisites of the day.

He halted. Rrobrechet, who had dismounted, walked solemnly up to she side of the horse, and commenced reading an address of welcome. The soldiery presented arms.

The new comer stood erect in his stirrups with surprise. The Prince laughed. Rrobrect had not got further in his recitation than—"Penetrated with a sense of delight at the honor conferred by your Royal Highness's presence, we cordially—" when the horseman expressed a hope to the Prince that the old gentleman was not a dangerous lunatic; for a lunatic of some sort he assuredly thought him.

"This is all a mistake," said the Prince.

"I should think it was," asserted the stranger. "Don't you know who I am, old fellow?"

These expressions assured the Baron that their utterer was not his Royal Highness the Grand-Duke of Saxe Kissankumagen.

"I am Heinrich, nephew to Master Hubert Oberschneider the tailor," continued the free-and-easy student. He then cantered off, leaving the soldiery at "present arms;" the band playing the march of triumph, and the Prince reeling with laughter in his saddle.

The disgusted Lord High Chamberlain and Commander-in-Chief pocketed his address, and set his army in motion towards home. On arriving at the palace, a letter was put into the Prince's hand by the postman who had passed them on the road, announcing that his cousin had been obliged to change his route.

Everything was in readiness for the fete which was intended to dazzle and astound his Royal Highness, the Grand-Duke of Saxe Kissankumagen; and the Premier was in despair! The Prince, on the contrary, took no pains to conceal his delight. "Baron," he said, "your talent for arranging and managing a fete shall not be thrown away. The festival shall still be held. You have my permission to command the presence of every soul in the city." His Serene Highness then sat down, and wrote an autograph letter to Mr. Oberschneider, inviting him, his daughter, and nephew, to dinner. At this democratic proceeding, the Baron Von Rrobrecht trembled for the security of the throne of Hesse Minnigissengen. But the Prince was peremptory, and the state servant was obliged to obey.

The invitation set every member of the establishment near the acacias in an exceeding flutter, except Heinrich. That young gentleman, having imbibed the politics of the least respectable of the Parisian estamintets, told his uncle that he would never sit at the table of a "tyrant."

Oberschneider, who was tying on his whitest neckcloth at the glass, made a grimace expressive of the most condign ridicule; to which his nephew retorted that he—Hubert Oberschneider, tailor—was a worshiper of power, and a sycophant! The uncle—an easy going, but shrewd man, who regularly read the papers, and knew what was going on in the world—said to his daughter, while escorting her to the palace, "The truth is, my dear, your cousin has got hold of those egregious notions which are so flattering to people who prefer amusement or idleness, to work. Property is robbery; restraint, tyranny; government, brigandage."

"How very odd!" said Albertina; who knew nothing of politics, and was thinking of the Prince.

The tailor went on, warming as his subject expanded. "Confounding such silly theories with the glorious acts of the true patriots, who have burst the bonds of royal chicanery in France, and of tyranny in some portions of this empire, Heinrich has, I fear, brought notions home to my shop which will unsettle the heads of all my journeymen."

"How very naughty of him!" said Albertina; because she felt it was necessary she must say something just then.

When they arrived at the palace, the Prince received them in the throne-roome, with marked distinction. The Baron Rrobrecht grinned and bore it (like one of his own heraldic hyenas) with wonderful fortitude.

The dinner went off well; because the rain, which fell in torrents, could not spoil that. But the fireworks proved utterly uninflammable, the thunderstorm drowned the music, and nobody could dance on the lawn; yet Albertina was there, and the Prince was delighted. She wore his favorite colors—white with blue ribbons.

"Baron," said he, that night after his guests had departed, "your fete was charming and amused me immensely. You may sell another farm to-morrow."

"Something must be done," returned the Prime Minister, who, to his other multifarious places, added that of Chancellor of the Exchequer; "our coffers are exhausted, and two years' revenues have been already anticipated. Only one resource remains—"

"Which is—?" interrogated the Prince, as he folded up a piece of blue ribbon and put it inside his vest.

"Marriage!"

The Prime Minister said this very solemnly. "You have a crowd of wealthy and noble cousins, out of which your Serene Highness might choose a wife—a rich wife."

The Prince yawned. He was tired. Would Von Rrobrecht ring for his valet?

Many days had not elapsed since the grand fete at the palace in honor of the Prince who did not arrive, before old Hubert's fears about his nephew proved true to the letter. He had originally conceived the idea of getting up a match between Albertina and her cousin; but the young student's course and turbulent manners were in the highest degree displeasing to the girl, and Heinrich himself made no efforts to overcome her antipathy. He passed his time in the public-houses, uttering a variety of common-places to a pack of young fellows, as idle and ill-disposed as himself. He formed them into a Club, and explained to them his political creed. He spoke a great deal about Brutus, and a "bloated oligarchy;" by which he meant the First Minister, who united in his own podgy little person all the aristocratic and oligarchical power of the state. He denounced the Prince merely as an incarnation of royalty, against which he made war in the abstract; but—because, perhaps, he found the roll of the Baron's name tell with effect in his harangues (for he had learned at Paris to revel in the canine letter,) his enmity towards the Baron "R-r-r-r-robrecht" was relentless. Every misfortune that happened to anybody, he attributed to the Government; otherwise to the bloated oligarchy; otherwise to R-r-r-r-robrecht. The storm on the night of the fete he traced to the vengeance of Heaven on the atrocious vices, corruptions, and oppressions of the court. When Hans Hiccup the cobbler reduced himself to beggary by beer, and people would not trust him with their boots, Heinrich held him up as a martyr to political oppression, and demanded an organization of labor. When Madame Maggschifter's baby took the small-pox, Heninrich had no manner of doubt that the infant had been infected by a secret emissary of Government. The Club spread the sentiments which their leader originated, and obtained the support of all idlers in Minnigissenbourgh.

Yet, for a people ground down by all manner of social and political oppression, the Minuigissenbourghers did not seem to be an unhappy or discontented community. Each lived in the bosom of his family. In the evening, under the acacias or lime trees that overshadowed these miserable people's porches might be heard the cheerful song, with its accompaniment of flute or harpsicord; neither was the native hurdy-gurdy silent.

It happened about this time that a violent hailstorm did some damage to the crops. This was an opportunity not to be lost. Heinrich and his acolytes spread themselves over the principality (this was soon done, and at a cost for travelling expenses quite nominal,) bewailing the loss of the husbandmen. They insinuated that one of the rights of the horticultural and agricultural interests was that of not having their glass broken, and their fields cut up by hail.

This doctrine soon became popular; for the most disagreeable of all human misfortunes are those which we are unable to lay at our neighbor's door. We would all of us rather be stoned almost to death by a man upon whom we can be revenged than be ever so gently hit by an aerolite, for the fall of which no one is responsible. Urged on, therefore, by the Club, the farmers profited by the hailstorm to neglect paying their rent, and to utter loud complaints and woeful lamentations.

The consequence of such defalcation was that the State Treasury became more and more impoverished; and Rrobrecht was obliged to discharge more servants, and sell two of the three horses which his royal master still possessed. Under these disagreeable circumstances, however, the Prince had his consolation. He practised new symphonies with his musicians; he passed his time in angling, and in botanizing expeditions into the woods, close to the dwelling of Master Hubert Oberschueider; where, by some extraordinary confluence of circumstances, he had very frequently the pleasure (entirely by accident) of meeting Albertina.

One day the student Heinrich, mounted upon a table covered with pots of beer and drinking-horns, spoke thus to his followers, at what he was pleased to term a Monster Meeting. Thirty-seven malcontents were actually present:

"It is time, my friends, that a corrupt and bloated oligarchy should cease from battening upon our substance! It is cowardice that produces the insolence of kings! Let us rend asunder the chains that have too long held captive our beautiful fatherland. Let us break the yoke of tyranny! Let us proceed at once to the palace, where the tyrant gives himself up to impure delights, surrounded by Von R-r-r-r-robrecht and his ferocious satellites: let us reclaim our rights and liberties, or perish in the attempt!"

By the time the peroration was finished, the crowd had increased to very nearly threescore.

While these affairs, big with the fate of Minnigissenbourgh, were passing at the bierhaus, the Prince was sauntering in his garden, plucking dead leaves from four favorite carnations, and angling for rhymes for a sonnet to Albertine's blue eyes. "Desires" and "fires" were just arranging themselves prettily at the ends of a couplet, when the conspirators, burning with beer and patriotism, arrived at the palace gates.

One of the ferocious satellites, of whom Heinrich had spoken, was then busily engaged in practicing on the flute his difficult part in the overture to Zauberflote, which the band was to perform on the following day. This warrior (who was posted as a sentry while practicing) permitted the revolters to pass, on their stating that they desired to speak to the Prince. But, as a preliminary precaution, he put down his flute, shouldered his firelock, dressed himself up in line with his sentry-box; and asked the invaders to be so good as to keep on the gravel-walks, and not to pluck the flowers.

The Prince, though a little surprised at this great gathering, turned his calm and indifferent countenance carelessly on the mob; and when he demanded what they wanted with him? no one had sufficient nerve to speak. They replied only by confused and almost unintelligible cries; amongst which, however, might be detected a timid stuttering, which sounded like "Down with the tyrant!"

The Prince smiled, and, in a voice which was clearly audible above the whispered clamor of the disaffected, said:

"Let some one among you speak for the whole; for, if you all speak in turns, it will take up too much time; and, if all together, you will not be intelligible."

At these words there was a dead silence. All recoiled a few paces; leaving by common assent to the student Heinrich the right of explaining those grievances, of which none were exactly cognizant.

"We stand here," said Heinrich, "in the name of—"

"Pray don't stand!" interrupted the Prince, pointing to a rustic chair.

"We come," continued the orator, not heeding the sarcastic invitation, "to protest against abuses too long suffered. We come in the name of the people!"

"My good friend," said the Prince. "My people are not so numerous as to have need of delegates. Haven't they spoken themselves? Let them assemble to-morrow in the inner court of the palace, and, if they wish it, we will have a chat together."

"The people have no time to wait!" exclaimed the orator, fiercely.

"Believe, Monsieur Heinrich, my calling of Prince is not such a delightful profession that I should desire to exercise it every day. I shall be a prince to-morrow; to-day I am but a private individual, very anxious respecting the fate of a beautiful carnation of which I have just set a cutting. As a private individual, therefore, I desire to be master of my own house. So, my friends, be advised by me, and go home. Above all do not tread upon my carnations."

Heinrich turned towards his friends. "Are you content," he said, "with the evasive, the ferocious irony, which has dictated the tyrant's words?"

"My worthy friend Heinrich," said the Prince quietly, "you really must be so obliging as to leave my garden."

"I see," said Heinrich, "that the end of the career which I have embraced, will bring me but a martyr's crown. Well, I am ready to shed my blood for the People. Take my head!"

"Your head? What should I do with your head? It is useless even to yourself," responded the Prince. "I shall expect my people to-morrow. I have some excellent beer; and we will discuss that while we talk over our affairs. In case of rain, there shall be an awning."

When the delegates had departed, the Prince made a bouquet of his finest carnations for Albertina; and wrote to remind her that she had promised to waltz with him on the ensuing evening.

At daybreak next morning the band assembled at the palace, for the final rehearsal of Beethoven's overture, which was to be performed, for the first time in public, that evening.

"What on earth can my people want with me?" thought Richard; "and what unfortunate accident can have recalled to their minds that I am a prince? However," he exclaimed to a servant, "rinse out some glasses for my people! Happy the sovereign who can thus hob-nob with his subjects!"

At the appointed hour, an assemblage of about one hundred persons made their appearance at the palace. After them came a second hundred, to see what the first hundred were about; and finally, the whole of the remaining inhabitants of the capital who were capable of locomotion, brought up the rear, anxious to ascertain the cause of the unaccustomed gathering.

"My friends, said his Serene Highness, "drink your beer while it is fresh."

The people did as they were told.

When the barrels had to be tilted, the Prince asked his people what they wanted? "Have I," he said, "ever interfered with your pleasures or your affairs? Do I even know what you do, or how you pass your time?"

"Down with the tyrants!" said Heinrich.

"Down with the tyrants!" shouted the Club in cuckoo chorus.

"Why is the Prince surrounded with guards?" demanded Henrich.

"I am surrounded by my musicians," replied the Prince; "the rest of the soldiers are gone out to take a walk. Pray be silent for one moment and listen to me; "I am not rich; but he among you, whoever he be, who has wished to partake of my soup or my beer, has he not ever been welcome?"

No one could deny this, therefore their leader went off into generalties.

"We desire," said Heinrich, "the liberty of the press."

"Well," replied the Prince, "buy a press if you want one. You have my full liberty to use it if you know how. But, alas, I am afraid that there are great many of you who cannot read."

Something was then said about "dying for liberty and fatherland;" but, during the parley, Von Rrobrecht had succeeded in collecting the scattered forces, and now disposed them round the court-yard. "I beg to acquaint your Highness," said he, pompously, "that our troops hem in the rebels on all sides, and that they are now in our power."

"I am sorry to hear it," said Richard; "for what am I to do with the rebels? I have no place to put them in. There is but one prison in Minnigissenbourgh, and that I converted long ago into an orangery. Dismiss the soldiers!"

"But if I might suggest to your Highness—your personal safety—"

"Pray don't alarm yourself about trifles, Baron, and do as I bid you."

"Treachery!" shouted Heinrich, as the soldiers moved.

"Treachery!" echoed the Club.

"The palace of the tyrant is about to be reddened with the blood of patriots!" screamed Heinrich, hoarsely.

But no denunciative enthusiasm was to be infused into the other patriots; too much of whose attentions were riveted on the Prince's beer. When they found the casks producing nothing but lees, they sauntered peaceably home.

After the signal failure of this "demonstration," all went on well for some time.

There being no Press, the liberty thereof could not be taken advantage of, and the pen supplied its place. Heinrich started a newspaper in manuscript, although never was a place so destitute of news as Minuigissenbourgh. However, despite few occurrences, leaders abounded. "R-r-r-r-robrecht," above all, was never spared: and the Prime Minister came one day to the Prince to request his permission to start a newspaper also.

"They have desired the liberty of the press," said his Highness; "that liberty is yours as well as theirs, and you may use it as you may think proper."

Then began the great paper war between Rrobrecht and Heinrich. The rival journals appeared every morning. Heinrich expressed in every number his conviction that all princes were criminals; Rrobrecht inculcated that a sovereign's most trivial action was angelic. One day the Baron announced "that his Serene Highness was in excellent health and spirits; no addition was made to the illustrious dinner circle; and his Serene Highness ate French beans." On the next day, Heinrich's paper came out with, "How long will an enslaved people suffer Tyranny to eat French beans?" In the succeeding number of Rrobrecht's paper it was replied, "That the Prince's fondness for French beans showed his unflinching desire to encourage agriculture."

"To eat French beans," retorted Heinrich, in Number three, "is a bitter mockery of the people; who cannot afford even sour-krout."

One evening the Prince was walking under the lime trees; Albertina happened (accidentally, as usual) to be passing that way. She showed the rival papers to the Prince. He laughed heartily at Heinrich's denunciations, and commanded Rrobrecht to discontinue his "organ" altogether.

In the mean while, Prince Richard's affairs went from bad to worse, until they brought him to the condition of a gentleman in hopelessly embarrassed circumstances. He had hardly a florin to bless himself with. Retrenchment was imperative. Having communicated with certain potentates, he therefore assembled his army, and addressed his brave soldiery in the following terms:

"My friends, I have no longer the means of paying you. I have, accordingly, disposed of your services to a great power, who will lead you into Africa and glory. You will have double pay."

The commissariat arrangements were neither extensive nor intricate; and the entire force was soon in heavy marching order (band included,) with drums beating and colors flying. The departing army made its first halt, on its way to Africa, at Zweibruken, the head-quarters of beer.

René of Anjou has said, that a king without music is a crowned ass; and the Prince, after the departure of his brave band, became the most unhappy of monarchs. Albertina alone consoled him; but in a very short time she also took her departure, accompanied by a female attendant. The alleged reason for the journey was a visit to an old relation.

The loss of his farms, of his fortune, of his army, and even of his hand, did not affect the Prince so much as the loss of Albertina; and the Prince placed in Rrobrecht's hands a letter addressed to his Serene Highness's uncle, in these terms:

"My Dear Uncle: I neither can, nor do I any longer desire to remain a Prince.

"When you receive this letter, I shall have taken my departure from my dominions. I abandon to you all my rights; requiring only at your hands, as a compensation for the same, a yearly pension of one thousand five hundred florins. I will let you know when you are to forward me my pension, and where. Keep Rrobrecht near your person; he is a good and loyal servant.

"I embrace you affectionately,

"Richard-Augustus-Frederic-Ernest-Alphonse-Hans-Albert."

The following morning, as soon as the rising sun had tinged with its first rosy beams the muslin curtains of his bedroom windows—silk curtains were used only in the throne-room—his Serene Highness sprang from his couch, dressed himself hastily, and proceeded to pack into a small valise his four most precious articles. To wit:

A small canvas bag containing thirty crowns.

A blue sash which had formerly encircled Albertina's waist.

Albertina's letters.

His own favorite flute.

This done, he glided down stairs, placed his valise upon his horse, mounted, and took his departure from Minnigissenbourgh. When he had reached the outskirts of the town, he paused, looked round, and his eyes rested upon the acacias which overshadowed the tailor's dwelling. After a long gaze, he sighed and went his way.

His horse padded on steadily. Towards evening, he arrived at a little forest retreat, also surrounded by acacias, and fronted by a nicely-mown grass-plot dotted with several flower-beds, each containing a variety of carnations in full bloom.

He entered the cottage, and an aged domestic received him politely. He had scarcely sat down near the window, when he perceived, at a turning of the gravel walk, two ladies approaching. One of them was old, of a gentle and prepossessing countenance; the other was Albertina.

In a few words the ex-Prince put the ladies in possession of all that had occurred. "Albertina," said the Prince, "how sweet would be a life spent here with you! I cannot now demand your hand, after having been refused possession of it when I was a prince. Behold to-day my entire fortune!—— I have thirty ducats in my valise, and I am assured a pension of fifteen hundred florins a year."

"My Prince," said the aunt, "you have no cause for despair. Albertina loves you. Remain here. She shall come to see me every month; and, when I shall have been assured that your resolution of marrying her is not the result of a momentary enthusiasm; when I am convinced that you do not regret your palace and power, then we will arrange all for the best."

Richard could make no other reply than that of kissing the kind old lady's wrinkled hand.

When she presented to him, three months later, the little hand of Albertina, he exclaimed, as he pressed it to his lips, "Adieu, adieu, Hesse Minnigissengen; adieu the sad past! And yet blessings be upon it, if it has been the price of the future!"

The future was happiness both to him and to Albertina. As plain unostentatious man and wife, they both henceforth lived in the cottage, part of the year, and in the finest seasons took pleasant tours to different parts of Europe.

The conclusion of the history of the great political movement which caused the ultimate downfall of the Tyrant of Hesse Minnigissengen, is soon told. By twelve o'clock on the day upon which the Prince fled there were eight princes of Hesse Minnigissengen; the same evening there were thirty-two. On the following morning, the Prince's uncle—who had gladly accepted his nephew's offer—sent over to Minnigissenbourgh an armed force, consisting of a corporal and ten men. In the brief space of two hours, these troops, effectually and forever, nipped the budding germs of the great Minnigissenbourgh revolt.—Household Words.

[For the Californian.]

THE CONNOISSEUR DECEIVED.

A MAN with whom I was very intimate when I was an inhabitant of cities, came to see me, and we conversed a great deal upon our opposite tastes and upon the things which occupy and give interest to our lives. On his part he takes no account of flowers, or trees, or the heavens, or the moon, or men, or animals, none of these can interest him till after they have been reduced, flattened, disfigured, and traced upon canvas by means of colors and a brush. He gives a high price for the images of things which in his eyes have no value; he paid 9,950 francs for a picture by Van Huysum. This picture represents a vase of flowers. The real bouquet—the living bouquet, with its splendor and its perfume, might be worth twenty sous. For the portrait of this bouquet, that is to say, a flat imitation, false in colors and smelling of oil, he paid 9,950 francs! and is proud and happy at having made so good a bargain!

I conducted him round my garden, but he looked at scarcely anything. A branch of hundred-leaved rose, bending under the weight of its blossoms, for a moment, however, attracted his attention, he looked at it and exclaimed, "How like that is to a bouquet of roses by Van Dael, which I have at home!"

It was evident that he thought nature had made an attempt to imitate his picture.

In the evening after supper, pipes and some Turkey tobacco were brought in, and we chatted upon all manner of things, but he always contrived means to bring the subject round to one of his pictures by some imperceptible thread or other.

At length, "Listen," said I. "I likewise have pictures, but I will only show them to you by daylight, to-morrow morning will do."

"And what pictures have you?" asked he, with a more than half-disdainful air.

"I have a great number."

"Are they pictures by known masters?"

"I suppose so, for I have never seen any more beautiful, more grand in their ensemble, or more finished in their details."

"Ah, we shall see that!"

"Oh! I don't conceal them from anybody. I am not one of those egotistical amateurs who find less pleasure in the possession of their pictures, than they do in the conviction that others have none, or at least they have not the same."

"Did your collection cost you much?"

"I got it for nothing."

"For nothing! Oh, I know what that means! Picture amateurs are divided into two classes; those of the first have expended millions upon their galleries, those of the second on the contrary, always get their pictures for nothing. Their pretence is to have discovered them on the shelves of some dealer in images or upon panels over the old chimneys of a village inn, or even among a lot of old bottles. You are of the second class."

"You are welcome to place me in which class you please."

"Well, but by whom are your best pictures?"

"Oh! as to that, I really cannot tell you; I have no memory for names. And to be frank with you, it is a circumstance I pay no attention to. I should prefer having a fine picture painted by my porter to a daub by Raphael. And what is very singular, this opinion worthy from its ingenuousness of being placed in the rank of the maxims and thoughts of M. de la Pollesse would easily pass for an originality or a whimsicality. I seek for nothing in painting but the true and the beautiful."

"You really excite my curiosity to see the pictures of a man who entertains such ideas Can't you recollect any of them?"

"Oh, yes. I could easily describe, at least for the most part, what my pictures represent."

"Well."

"Well, I have one above this room; it is of a vast plain surrounded on all sides by trees. Upon the verdant grass, dotted with shadow and light by the sun which is setting behind the trees, repose some sheep. The whole has a charm of calmness and repose which yields the greatest pleasure."

"I am sure that is by Van der Does. Well, that is not worth much."

"All I know is that it is very beautiful, and I do not believe it is by Van der Does."

"You astonish me!"

"Another is a sunken road, such as in Normandy is called une cavée. Travellers walk lower than the roots of the trees, whose tops extend over the wall of earth which forms the two sides of the road, thick and long roots like serpents."

"I should not be surprised if that were a copy; and my reason for thinking so, a reason which I think good and not subject to contradiction, is that I possess the original, which is by J. Ruysdael."

"I assure you it is not a copy."

"Oh! we shall see."

"I am convinced that a sight of the picture will make you change your opinion. By the side of it you see the entrance to a village. Amidst trees with rounded tops shoots up the church spire; the sun, which casts his oblique rays, fills the foliage of the trees with golden sparks; a peasant is drawing home his cart."

"If that picture be as I think it is, by J. Ostade, it is valuable."

"I do not believe that any Ostade ever did anything approaching it."

"My dear friend, you don't understand the Ostades."

"I was yesterday looking at another picture which delighted me very much: A child was seated at a window blowing soap-bubbles. The child was serious and attentive, whilst the bubble, still captive, appeared to grow larger and larger as it balanced itself upon an imperceptible breath of air. The most enchanting colors succeeded each other upon this frail globe of glass."

"Oh, that is a well-known picture! I saw it at the house of an amateur, from whom you must have bought it. That is by J. Mieris."

"I did not buy it."

"Oh dear, no! I suppose it was given to you!—or else you found it! As I told you, you are an amateur of the second class. You pretend to have got for nothing a picture worth 6,000 francs."

"The background of another is composed of magnificent chestnut trees, with large leaves of golden green, rendered still more so by the rays of the setting sun; a small house, covered with vines, is entirely gilded by the last warm rays of the star of day; nearer and towards the centre a Bohemian olive, and an elder tree much lower down, so that the oblique rays of the sun, passing over and into the shade, leave the foliage of the first of a whitish hue, and the tuft of the latter of a dark green. In front of the elder is a purple-blossomed rose; its lower flowers are in the shade, one alone, which shoots beyond the elder, catches a ray of the sun and looks like a magnificent ruby."

"Are there no figures?"

"None."

"Then I cannot tell whom that can be by."

"I feel no donbt that you will recognize the master when you see it."

"Very possibly—nay, very probably I may; but, at any rate, my memory does not furnish me with anything like that."

"I saw another this morning which much interested me. It was a beautiful woman holding a pink in her hand."

"Oh, well known; that's by Rubens."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it; but you must permit me to be less sure of another thing."

"Oh certainly; and pray what is the thing of which you are not sure?"

"That is, that this picture can belong to you."

"My dear friend, allow me to speak frankly to you. There is one thing I greatly fear on your part; I am afraid you are the dupe of some picture dealer, who has plundered you and made you pay very dear for mere daubs."

"I beg you, my good friend, to keep this kind interest for others. I do assure you that the pictures of which I tell you are all that is most beautiful. I have never seen any in any gallery which can compare with mine, either in truth, design or color."

"I am accustomed to hear every amateur, if he be only the owner of three middling copies, or five or six unknown sketches, seek to make himself believe that he possesses miracles. Now I may be allowed to say to you what I am going to observe, because you do not pretend to be rich, but, on the contrary, you pretend not to be so. Well, I know the value of the pictures you have described to me, and I declare to you that if you really possess them—if, as you tell me, these form but a small part of your collection—if you have not amused yourself with laughing at me—how many pictures have you?"

"Too many to count."

"Well, then, your gallery cannot have cost less than 200,000 francs."

"Nonsense! It cost me nothing."

"You are certainly the most audacious of any amateur of this kind I have ever met with. I wish to-morrow were come."

The next morning I led my friend into a large room with four windows, and said to him: "Here are my pictures, and the windows are the frames."

"Oh! that's but a joke!"

"Not at all. Look; some of my pictures are a little changed since the last time I saw them, but they are not the less beautiful on that account. This is the one you took to be Ostade, and which is, as the others, simply by the Almighty. These are the trees and the steeple. The cart is no longer there; but there is a girl driving cows to pasture, which is better. Do you believe that Ostade ever attained that truth, that drawing, that color, that light?

Here on your left, through the other window, is the hollowed road, which is not by J. Ruysdael, and of which you pretend to have the original. I had a right, however, to tell you that mine is not a copy; it is evident, that of the two pictures, however original yours may be, mine is not the copy.

"And here is the meadow upon which the sun and shade play with such effect; there are the tall trees, and the sheep which repose upon the grass; that is likewise by the Almighy, and not by Van der Does."

"Well, well, it's all a very good joke."

"No; I am not joking at all; so far from it that I think it is you who are joking, or else take me for an idiot, to hope to make me believe that you attach more value to a little tree daubed upon canvass, flat, without shade, without color, without perfume, without the song of birds, than to that noble living tree, which, perfumed and harmonious covers us with its shade?

"What you pay 200,000 francs for the imperfect imitation of a tree worth five francs? Will you venture to speak of the difficulty overcome? Why do you not pay more dearly for the imitation of diamonds and rubies than for true diamonds and rubies? And yet that imitation is much more perfect, and is so successful as to deceive almost anybody. False jewels, as well as true, shine and draw upon those who wear them the same admiration, envy and hatred that the real ones would, whilst no one is deceived by the painting. The birds which, according to Pliny, wanted to eat the grapes by Zeuxis, would not be taken in now-a-days; there does not exist any bird so silly as to attempt to build its nest in a painted tree.

"What! and is it to pay so dearly for feeble imitations of all the beautiful things we can have for nothing, that men ruin themselves, fill their lives with anxieties and cares, and stuff their pillows with thorns?

"No, no; it is you who are joking and who are laughing at me, or else I must believe that you, and all who resemble you, are downright madmen. AKARR.

ON THE POTOMAC.

POTOMAC sweeps in silver tide
By tangled brake and shadowed wood,
And rolling seas of verdure hide
The footsteps where great armies stood;
Old moss-grown trees all rent and torn,
Mark where the iron tempest came,
And 'neath the wild rose and the thorn
Are graves unmarked by cross or name.

The golden morn now paints the flowers
That once were wet with crimson rain,
But dew, and sun, and mist, and showers,
Have washed away the battle's stain;
The purple violets seek the shade,
And lilies hide their heads away,
Where patriot bones obscure are laid,
And heroes' hearts have turned to clay.

And many a relic strewn aronnd,
Marks deathly struggles of the brave,
Whose blood has fed the thirsty ground,
Whose dust has filled a common grave;
And many weep in homes afar,
The nameless warriors sleeping here,
Who, crushed beneath the heel of war,
Find record only in a tear.

And years on years shall come and go
While broad Potomac, rolling by,
Still tireless spreads in ebb and flow
Beneath the blue unchanging sky;
But these, the heroes of our age
Whose grass-grown graves like billows rise,
Shall live in history's brightest page,
For Truth or Freedom never dies.

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR regular New York letter having been delayed by Overland Mail, we give the following items which have not been anticipated by the last steamer papers:

PETROLIMANIA.

The great petrolium excitement, which engrossed the atteution of the numerous projectors of new enterprises in New York has subsided. Hereafter few stocks in companies formed on undeveloped lands can be sold, and the oil production for the future will depend upon the success of individual success and enterprise. We have a large mental, not pecuniary, faith in the eventual profits to be derived from these ventures by the original organizers of the companies who mean work, and to their work carry the habits of sound business men and careful economical management. The want of the latter qualification will be the cause of the failure of most of the schemes. The scene of operations is too much at arm's length, and until integrity in private servants becomes as common as thriftlessness and indifference now seem to be, the results will be barren of dividends. There are always bubbles on the surface of turbulent streams; but their prismatic hues induce the desire for possession only iu the minds of the children upon the banks. They know not that for large returns large risks must be tckeu, and that if one can get seven per cent. for his surplus capital in this commuuity he is doing well.

LITERARY ANA.

The publishers announce long lists of new books for summer reading, an indication that that most sensitive trade feels as yet but little the general depression which prevails here since the stopping of the war.

The brothers Sweetzer have dissolved the co-partnership held by them in publishing The Round Table, which paper, with the exception of THE CALIFORNIAN. was the best literary and family paper ever published in the country, and have each established a new paper, one of them retaiuing the old name of The Round Table, the other taking that of The Neighbor. Whether they both succeed is a chance, which is against them; but if they do, it will be an indicatiou of growing good taste and intelligence among the common readers, for all the literary men aud professional gentlemen alone would not begin to pay the profits looked for from such a source, even if they all read it, which they will not do. If the New York bar increases the numper of its members twice a year to such an extent as it did last week by the admission of the one hundred and fourteen successful applicants at the May examination, it will soon insure the success of any paper that could obtain the support of the bar alone, provided the subscriptions were paid in advance. What a magnificent prospect these young men have for sncccss. In ten years ninety per cent. of them will be out of the way of the new men, who will then, as now, come upon the commnity as so many Websters or O'Connors, to dazzle to awe and to delight their expecting eyes. POPULAR FALLACIES.—No. 1.

EVERY one is familiar—or every one should be—with the essays of "Elia," and with the delightful chapter on "Popular Fallacies," in which the charming humorist impeaches the truthfulness of many wise saws and modern instances, as when, contesting the maxim "That a man should not laugh at his own jest," he likens its observance to "sitting esnrient at one's own table." Laman Blanchard worked the same vein at greater length. Perhaps it is not yet exhausted, and we may find some good ore iu following the same lead or at least in working the tailings left by such able explorers.

Aware of the sacredness of old opinions, of the tenacity with which conservatives cling to the traditious of the elders and to the aphorisms of their juvenile copy-books, we would not rashly assume the office of an iconoclast. We do not propose to unsettle the foundations of moral or social scieuce, or to knock away the underpinning of politics, rotten thongh it be, or to pull down the pillars of the temple of religion about our own ears. We have an easier task, and that is to toss up some of the current coin of mediæval and antediluvian proverbs and see if they have the true metallic ring. A classic author has said, "Populus vult decipi;" and Mr. Barnum, with equal elegance, says: "People like to be humbugged." Do they like to be undeceived? Is there not oftentimes, it may be asked, as much comfort in hugging a delusion as a verity? Doubtless, dear reader, you have your pet fallacies, which you have come to believe from frequent iteration, and which, though you may secretly suspect their hollowness, you will defend, from pride of opinion or desire of seeming consistency. If so, and you fear to have your pou sto or standing-place disturbed, step one side while we challenge the saying that "A man is known by the company he keeps." Was Boswell, the toady aud lickspittle, a fair representative of bluff, burly, independent Sam Johnson? Was Prince Hal much like Falstaff? Would you have foreseen the laborious, ambitious, valiant Henry V., the hero of Agincourt, in the boon companion of tipplers and braggarts? Would you have known Burns by his pot-house companions? Because Sheridan, Goldsmith, and a host of other eminent writers were fond of low company, were their mates necessarily their peers? Many persons habitually choose for intimates their inferiors. This arises sometimes from shyness or diffidence, or that self-distrust which makes one ill at ease in the presence of greatness, having its root in a sentiment of reverence, which oft-times overrates others.

Why do meu of genius so often choose simple-minded women for their wives? Are the people who are the most eager to force their way into what is called good society, persons of the most refinement? Are tuft-hunters and toad-eaters generally persons of noble natures, or simply those who, from petty vanity, would like to be esteemed such?

Take the case of schoolmates in whom the social sentiment shows itself by devoted though often short-lived attachments. In nine cases out of ten, you will find a gentle, timorous boy, the fidus Achates of some incipient bully, or a giddy, sentimental, romantic girl, paired off with some sedate, sensible, and practical maiden. In fact, people choose their associates more from the principle of contrast than from that of resemblance. One seeks in a friend, something not in one's self, and characters which are complementary or supplementary of each other harmonize best.

The weak naturally seek alliance with the strong; the gentle with the brave; the yielding and self-distrustful affiliate with the strong-willed and self-confident. Two obstinate people will not assimilate. There is more friction between steel and steel than between steel and brass.

In business partnerships, that is the most efficient in which opposite qualifications interact and mutually assist each other, the one supplying the defects of the other—a man of comprehensive plans requiring an associate with a genius for detail, or the rash and hasty being well-balanced by the cautious and prudent. A philosopher does not want a bluestocking for a wife, but rather a good housewife.

There are many half-truths circulating as absolute verities, which, taken in an unlimited sense, are utter fallacies. Of these, is the hackneyed saying, "Man is the creature of circumstances," and its opposite, "Every man is the architect of his own fortune." Neither of these is wholly true, each is partly true, partly false. One is pure fatalism; the other is free-will unlimited. The truth lies between them, or rather in both united.

In reality, human destiny is the product of two factors, inner force and outward force, or self-will and environment. In some lives one factor is the larger, in others the other; but no life is the result of either exclusively.

Some men are much more the creatures of circumstance than others. They seem almost content to drift with the current, exerting little directive force upon their own frail barks. Others delight to breast the billows and to row against wind and tide. Some are born leaders, innovators, aggressive spirits. These are the strong-willed. Others make good followers, imitators. These are the gentle spirits.

Butler, in Hudibras, leaning to the fatalistic view of life, says:

"For whatsoe'er we perpetrate,
We do but row, we're steered by Fate."

In more graceful terms, an eloquent divine of our city, illustrating the interposition of a kind Providence in human affairs, says: "We feel the force of the current blend with the stroke of our oars." Whatever the ancients believed of an overruling fatality, to which eveu the gods were subject, moralists now all preach the doctrine that a man may take the helm of his own life-craft—paddle his own canoe, in other words; and although Shakspeare has been made to say, "There's a Divinity that shapes our ends rough; hew them how we will," it is nrged that we may smooth the rough edges if we will.

Carlyle and others have written much to show the superiority of a man to his environment, and it seems the partisans of free-will have rather the best of the argument at present. Sydney's gallant motto, "Aut viam inveniam aut faciam"—"I will either fiud a way or make one"—breathes a healthier spirit than one of weak submission to destiny.

In reading the lives of the so-called self-made men, and the praise their biographers lavish upon energy, perseverance and will, as qualities to be cultivated and imitated, we have sometimes thought this resolving to be resolute, when you have not the resolution to begin with, is a good deal like trying to lift yourself by pulling at your boot-straps. But leaving to the clergy to settle how far a mau may make himself what he would like to be, we pass to another popular fallacy.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

AT abont ten o'clock Mouday morning, says the Sacramento Union, the walls, floor, and roof of the grain warehouse of H. G. Smith, on Front street, below L, fell with a terrible crash, creating alarm and consternation in the neighborhood and giving rise to a general alarm of fire in the city. The building was forty-two feet wide and one hundred and fifty feet deep, and consisted of one story, eighteen or tweuty feet high, and a basement beneath. The proprietor, who is heavily engaged in the grain trade, had stored on both floors some fifteen hundred tons of wheat and barley. Of this quantity, about one thousand tons occupied the upper or main floor.

OUR town is again beginning to improve in business prospects, and we may soon expect better times. Every laborer in town has been pressed into service by the various mining companies which have recently resumed work. The demand for laborers has caused an advance in wages, and the miners are again in good humor. From all the information we can get from the companies on this side of the mountains we judge Aurora to be about as well off as any of them.—Esmeralda Union.

J. S. REETER, of Sonora, lost the sum of $180 in coin on board the steamer Helen Hensley, August 5th. The sum was placed in his wife's reticule. Some other articles, with $150 in greenbacks, were untouched.

A. J. TALBOT in Virginia City, recently, put up a revolver ball at the distance of thirty-six feet, and hit it fairly and squarely at the first shot from his pistol. Talbot shot an apple off the head of E. W. Clarkson at the same distance, not long since.

THE navigation of the Sacramento is being improved by the construction of a wing dam on the Yolo side of the river near the bridge, by Captain W. Pierce, under the direction of a Board of Commissioners appointed by the city. It is to be so constructed says the Bee, that while it will force the water to this side of the river during the low stages, it will be easily swept away by the first freshet of Winter, and all danger of flooding the city easily avoided.

A MAN named Jack Davis, near Sonoma, killed his wife, August 5th, at about two A. M., by stamping her with his foot. He then took a pistol and shot himself. He was not dead at last accounts, and was likely to recover. Davis was a farmer; he had been drinking considerably of late.

THE Wilmington Journal says that recently Mr. Christ, a man about forty five years of age, went out iu a small boat and has not since been seen. As the boat was found near the mouth of the San Gabriel river, it is feared he has been drowned.

THE average shipment per day of copper ore from Stockton, is two thousand sacks.

THE new and magnificent Theatre in Marysville will be opened on Wednesday evening next, the 16th inst., by a company from Maguire's Opera House, San Fraucisco, with Miss Sophie Edwin as star.

JOHN MITCHELL and Jeff. Cramner were killed by foul air, in the Samson Tunnel, at Dry Creek, near Vallecito, on Wednesday last, and several men who went to the rescue narrowly escaped the same fate.

THE CATHEDRAL LIBRARY.

IT is now between forty and fifty years ago that I obtained leave from the Dean and Chapter of Winterbury Cathedral to read for some weeks in their cathedral library. The editions of the Fathers and of some important Middle-Age writers which are preserved in that quiet library boast of peculiar excellence, and I well remember the exultation with which I, then a very young man, received news of the desired permission to rausack those treasures. Having secured a small lodging in the Close, or cathedral enclosure, I set out for Winterbury early in the year 182—. Through the kindness of one of the canons, who seldom had to consult the library on his own account, I was provided with a key to the library buildings, and allowed to keep undisturbed possession of it as long as my visit lasted. This key gave access not only to the library, but to all parts of the cathedral likewise, including even the cloisters, so that I was able to let myself in and out of the noble edifice at all hours of the day or night, and to ramble unchallenged through aisle, crypt, stalls, triforium and organ-loft.

I have never forgotten, and shall never forget, the day on which I first took my seat in the room which was to be the special scene of my labors. The library lay on the south side of the cathedral, being a lower continuation of the south transept, and forming one side of the cloister court. It was obviously, therefore, raised above the height of the cloister-vaulting, and it was reached by a flight of stairs opening into the cathedral itself. Narrowness (it measured about eighty feet by thirty,) and a certain antique collegiate air (and smell too, to be perfectly accurate) about the bindings of the books and the coverings of the chairs, were its chief characteristics. There was a bust of Cicero at one end, and of Seneca at the other. Some smaller busts of the principal Greek fathers adorned the side-shelves, and a dingy portrait of the "judicious" Hooker abode in a musty frame over the heavy stone mantelpiece. The fender itself was of stone, or rather the fireplace was not protected by any fender at all, but by a small stone wall, about three inches thick and six inches high, which afforded blissful repose to the outstretched foot.

One evening, shortly after sunset, when there was still light enough to read the titles on the backs of books, I came across the Close in order to fetch and bring away with me a couple of volumes of which I stood in need. It was an hour when the grand old cathedral is accustomed to put on its very best appearance. The heaven-kissing spire and the far lower, but beautiful, western towers are tinted with the faint rose-color which suits old stonework so admirably; and the deep gloom of the cloisters, tempered by the glow from the noble piles of masonry overhead, makes it possible and easy to realize some of the rapturous visions of the recluse. I passed as usual down the nave, and having ascended the little staircase, let myself into the library, and was on the point of attacking the necessary bookshelf, when, instead of placing the key in my pocket, as it was my habit to do, I tossed it carelessly on to the sill of an adjoining window. The woodwork of the library was by no means in a sound condition, and between the inner edge of the sill and the wall there was a wide chink, opening down into unseen depths of distance. Into this chink, impelled by my evil genius, or by one of the ghostly beings that (as I was assured by the verger) haunt the library and cloisters, down tumbled my unlucky key. I saw it disappear with a sharp twinge of vexation, principally, however, at the thought of the time and trouble that would be consumed in bringing it to light again. To-morrow, I said myself, I shall be forced to get a carpenter to remove this sill, and rake up the key from Heaven knows where; while smirking Mr. Screens, the verger, will watch the whole proceeding and insinuate, with silent suavity, a doubt whether I am a fit person to be entrusted with Canon Doolittle's key. It was not until I had come down from the short laddder with the books under my arm, and, warned by the deepening shades, was about to leave the library, that the full effect of the key's disappearance presented itself to my mind. The outer gate and inner door of the nave had been carefully shut by me, according to custom, on entering the cathedral. All the gates and doors were fitted with a spring-lock, so that without my key I was double-locked into the building. My first thought was one of amusement, and I fairly laughed aloud at my own perplexity. It seemed an impossible and inconceivable thing that one might really have to pass the entire night in this situation. Presently I left the library, the door of which I had not shut on entering, and went down the staircase into the transept, and then into the nave. I carefully tried the inner door, but without effect. I had done my duty on entering, and it was hopelessly and mercilessly fastened against me. Resolved on maintaining unbroken self-possession, I returned to the library. It was now quite dark, the only light being that reflected from the shafts of the cloisters, on which the moonbeams were now beginning to fall. I sat down in a large arm-chair which stood at one end of the library table, and thought over all the possible means of extricating myself from an unexpected durance. Should I go up to the belfry in the northwestern tower and toll one of the bells until the verger, roused from his first sleep, should come to see what was the matter? but even this I could not do without the key, which would be required to open the door at the entrance of the tower. Or should I make my way into the organ-loft, and, filling the bellows quite full, strike a succession of loud chords, until the music might attract the attention of some passer-by? this might be done, but it would be a perilous experiment. Half Winterbury would be seized with the belief that their old cathedral was haunted. The organ-loft would be idvaded by vergers, beadles, and constables—there were no blue-coated police in those days—and I should move about the ancient city ever after with the stigma of a madcap on my head. People would nod knowingly to one another as I passed, and significantly tap their foreheads, by way of hinting that I was "a little touched." Canon Doolittle would recall his key, and abstain from inviting me to his hospitable table. Gradually, therefore, I gave up the scheme of saving myself by means of the organ; and the belfry being already set aside, no other resource remained but to stay where I was, and quietly to pass the hours as best I could until Mr. Screens should open the doors at about half-past six in the morning, ready for the seven o'clock prayers in the Lady Chapel.

I was luckily undisturbed by any fears arising from the possible anxiety of my landlady. Winterbury is near the sea; and I had on more more than one occasion spent a night on the cliffs, watching the glorious moonlit effects upon the romantic coast scenery of that district. These, Mrs. Jollisole was accustomed to call my "coastguard nights;" and I made no doubt that, should I fail to appear, the sensible old lady would go contentedly to bed, supposing me to have mounted guard on the cliffs.

I therefore lost no time in composing myself, if not to sleep, at any rate to an attempt at sleep. The library table was always surrounded by an array of solemn old oak chairs, padded with cushions of yellowish leather, and looking as though—if their own opinion were consulted—no mortal man of lower degree than a prebendary should ever be allowed to seat himself upon them. At each end of the table there was a chair of a superior order—a couple of deans, as it were, keeping high state amidst the surrounding canons. These chairs were made of precisely the same kind of oak, and covered with leather of exactly the same yellowish tinge as the others, but their whole design was larger and more imposing, and what was of the most consequence to me in my present position—they were arm-chairs, affording opportunity for all manner of easy and sleep-inviting postures. Throwing myself into one of these dignified receptacles, I soon fell asleep, and soon afterwards took to dreaming.

Leaning in my dream on the sill of the library window, I fancied myself to be gazing down into a peaceful churchyard. One by one, like gleams of moonlight in the dark shade of the surrounding cloisters, I saw a number of young girls assemble, and fall with easy exactitude into rank, as if about to take part in a procession. Each slender figure was draped in the purest white muslin, with a veil of the same material arranged over the head, and partially concealing the face. Just as one sees at the present day in Roman Catholic churches at the more important fêtes, the procession was arranged according to the gradations of height. The very young children were in the front, and as the other end of the line was approached, the pretty white figures grew gradually taller, until girls of eighteen or nineteen brought up the rear. They presently began to move, and it was clear that they were about to take part in some solemn office for the dead. With two priests at their head, they made the circuit of the cloisters, moving along with graceful regularity of step. Between each pair of the slender columns of the cloister building, I imagined that a small stone basin (or benitier) was set, standing on a low pedestal, and filled with holy-water. Each girl walking on the side next to these basins was furnished with a small broom of feathers, like those which may at any time be seen in the Continental churches. Dipping these brooms from time to time into the basins of water, they waved them in beautiful harmony with their own harmonious movements, sprinkling the ancient monumental slabs over which they were stepping. They sang to a strain of rare melody, the familiar words of Requiem Æternam.

Presently they seemed to change time and tune, and to sing a hymn of many verses, each verse ending with a refrain. A single voice would give the verse, but all joined together in the plaintive music of the refrain:

> Through life's long day and death's dark night,
> O gentle Jesus! be our Light!

I have heard much music, secular and sacred, since then; but I know of no musical effect which abides with me so constantly as that imagined chanting of young voices heard long ago.

One girl in particular attracted my attention as I dreamt. She was one of the pair who closed the procession, and was of a commanding height and extremely elegant figure. She had, as it seemed to me, taken excessive precaution in drawing her ample veil closely around her head and face.

* * * * *

On a sudden I awoke. There, in one of the decanal arm-chairs. I was sitting—in an easy, familiar posture, as if I had been myself a dean—and there beside me, close at hand, within reach of my outstretched arm, was a tall figure in white, clearly a female form, and the precaution had been taken of drawing an ample veil closely around the head and face. Any one but an imbecile would have acted as I did, though I remember taking some credit to myself at the time for my coolness and presence of mind. I simply sat still and stared; and by degrees I observed, I conned. Years before, in my boyhood, I had walked a good deal on the stretch: and I had known what it was in North Devon to wake up "upon the middle of the night," to feel the hard, unyielding turf underneath one's back, and to see and gaze, gaze wistfully upon the bright unanswering stars above one's head. Even then one could divine the true value of a bed. But to wake on the downs in the small hours, is a trifle compared with waking in a cathedral any time between dew and dawn. More especially when, as was my case, you have a ghost at your elbow. Not that my ghost remained long stationary. She did not. Starting from my arm-chair, she began a survey of the shelves by moonlight in so active and business-like a manner that I felt no doubt, given her quondam or present mortality, she was or had been "a blue." In five minutes, my powers of decision were wide awake, and the question of her mortality was settled. She was not a thing of the past, but alive as I myself was, and the only scruple was, how or how soon to awaken her from her somnambulist's dream. While I was debating with myself the best plan to pursue, she suddenly passed out of the library door on to the stone staircase. My alarm was now fairly excited. She had two courses to pursue in her sensational career—I employ the word in a more correct use than it is commonly put to. She might either turn downwards, towards the floor of the church itself, in which case she could do herself little or no harm; or she could mount the ascending staircase, and reach an outward parapet with Heaven knew what mad scheme in view, before I would have time to overtake her. She chose the second alternative, and—she leading, I following—we mounted the lofty staircase that leads to the base of the spire.

I was aware that the door at the top of this particular ascent was not furnished with a lock; it was fastened by a simple bolt, but I had little doubt that my sleep-waking friend would shoot that bolt back as readily as she had taken down and replaced the books on the library shelves. My greatest fear was that she might begin playing some mad prank upon the parapet before I was sufficiently near to arrest her movements. I need hardly add that, influenced by the dread of consequences commonly said to follow on a sudden awakening from a fit of somnambulism, I inwardly resolved to try every means of humoring and coaxing my companion down again to terra firma, and only as a last resort to attempt arousing her.

In a few moments we stood side by side on the platform looking down on Winterbury, which lay outstretched in the white moonlight. It was a tranquil and beautiful scene. There was the church of St. Werburgh, a noble monument of thirteenth-century building, which would attract instantaneous admiration anywhere but under the shadow of Winterbury Cathedral. There was the fine old market place, with the carved stone pump at which Cromwell drank as he passed through the city; and the charmingly quaint Guildhall, and the ruins of the abbey skirting the river in the distance. I was not permitted, however, long to enjoy the prospect. Before I could lift a finger to arrest her rapid movements, my mysterious companion had stepped lightly on to the parapet, and began a quick and perfectly unembarrassed walk around it. Dreading the experiment of forcible rescue, it occurred to me to try the effect of quietly accosting her, and endeavoring—by humoring her present mental condition—to decoy her away from her perilous amusement. It was an awful moment of suspense. Should she lose her balance and her life, it would be next to impossible for me ever totally to clear up the enigmatical circumstance of my having been actually present by her side during that wierd moonlight dance upon the parapet. If, on the other hand, I were to seize and lift her from the top-stone, she might rouse the whole close with frightful screams she might faint—might even die—in my arms, or from the shock of sudden awakening she might lose her reason.

But there was no time to stand balancing chances. Accordingly, I gently drew towards her side, and said, in as easy and collected a tone as I could command:

"I think we left the library door unlocked; before you complete your rounds, had we not better go down the stairs and secure it? Having been allowed the entry of the cathedral, I think we are bound in honor to shut the door after us."

"To be sure," she replied, and instantly, to my intense relief, dropped cleverly down into the space between the parapet and the lower courses of the spire. "To be sure, the door should be locked at once. Let us go down. I cannot make out who you are. In none of my former visits to the cathedral have I met you; but you seem to be no intruder, and I will certainly go down and secure the door as you suggest."

All this was uttered quickly and easily, but with an abstracted air, and without the slightest motion of her steadfast eyes. While still speaking, she stooped under the low doorway at the stair-head, and began to descend. I followed, busily devising plans for preventing any fresh ascent, and yet still avoiding the necessity of breaking the curious spell which bound her. We reached the library door. To my surprise she produced a key of her own, and was about to turn the lock when I remembered that at this rate I should be deprived for the rest of the night of my only comforts, the warm atmosphere of the library and the decanal arm-chair. I therefore extemporized a bold stroke.

"Excuse me," I said; "I have left my hat and a few papers inside, and having a canon's key, I will save you the trouble of locking up. But permit me to suggest that it is still very early in April and the night is cold. Why not give up the rest of your walk for to-night, and return again on one of the glorious nights in May or June?"

Without uttering a syllable in reply, she turned on her heel and began slowly descending the staircase into the transept. My curiosity was now fairly on the alert, and I resolved to unravel the mystery, at least so far as to discover by what means she would leave the cathedral, and in what direction she would go. Stepping for a moment inside the library, I hastily but quietly slipped off my shoes on the matting of the floor, and followed her barefoot and silent. She was just stepping from the staircase into the transept, when I caught sight of her again. With the same steady and self-possessed action which she had displayed throughout, she crossed the transept, and made straight for a small postern door which led, as I knew, into the garden of the bishop's palace. This she unlocked, and I made sure that, having passed through, she would lock it again behind her. Whether, however, she was a little forgetful that night, or whether the unexpected rencontre with a stranger had ruffled the tranquil serenity of her trance, it so happened that she omitted to turn the lock, and I was able, after gently reopening the door, to trace her progress still further. Under the noble cedars of the episcopal gardens, past long flower-beds and fresh-mown lawns, I followed her, barefoot, until we arrived within a few yards of the hinder buildings of the palace.

Here I stopped under the dark shade of a cedar, and watched my companion walk coolly up to a little oaken, iron-clamped door, open it, and disappear within the house. Then of course I retraced my steps towards the cathedral. But stopping again under one of the magnificent cedars, I could not avoid a few moments' reflection on the exceedingly odd position into which accident had brought me. Here was I, alone and barefooted, standing, at two o'clock in the morning, on the lawn of the palace, where I had no more business than I had at the top of the spire; and the only place in which I could find shelter for the night was the cathedral itself, a building that most people would rather avoid than enter during the small hours. The queerness of my situation, however, did not prevent me from enjoying to the full the extreme loveliness of the gardens, and the glorious view of the splendid edifice, rising white and clear in the moonlight above their shady alleys and recesses.

On regaining the library, I dozed away the remainder of the dark hours in the same commodious arm-chair, and as soon as the bell began to toll for the seven o'clock prayers, I passed unnoticed out of the building and regained my lodgings.

"Been keeping a coastguard night, sir?" said Mrs. Jollisole, as she set the breakfast things in order.

"Why, yes, Mrs. Jollisole," I answered; "I did enjoy some rather extensive prospects last night."

And that was all that passed. I had fixed it in my own mind that I would keep my own counsel strictly until I should have called at the palace and communicated the whole of the circumstances in confidence to the Bishop, with whom I was slightly acquainted.

This plan I carried into effect in the course of the morning. His lordship was at home, and listened with his customary kindness and courtesy to the whole of my romantic recital. Just as I was finishing, his study door opened, and a young lady entered, dressed in black, tall and strikingly beautiful, though looking pale and fagged. Glancing at me, she gave a slight start, and taking a book from one of the shelves, instantly left the room, after a few muttered words of apology for disturbing the bishop. It was my companion of the library and the tower.

"I see," said his lordship, "that you have recognized the ghost. That young lady is an orphan niece of mine, and has been brought up in my house since her infancy. Never strong, she has reduced what vigor she possessed by her ardent love of books, and her intellectual interest is awake to all kinds of subjects. She is equally unwearied in visiting amongst the poor, and often returns home from her rounds in a state of exhaustion from which it is very difficult to rouse her. About a twelvemonth ago we first noticed a tendency to somnambulism. She was removed for several weeks to the sea side, and we began to hope that permanent improvement had set in. A severe loss, however, which she has lately sustained, has, I fear, done her great injury, and here is proof of the old malady returning. We are indebted to you, sir," added the kind old man, "for your judicious and thoughtful way of proceeding under the circumstances of last night, and for at once putting me in possession of the details, which will enable me to take the necessary precautions."

Before leaving the Bishop's company, I begged him to go with me into the cathedral, and to be present while a carpenter removed the woodwork of the library window, in order to recover the key. This he consented at once to do, and we crossed the gardens by the very route which "the ghost" and I had traversed during the night. On removing the panelling we found that the depth of the chink was comparatively trifling, and the key was soon seen shining among the dust.

I was further gratified by another discovery, which, together with the extreme pleasure which it gave the bishop, quite indemnified me for my night's imprisonment. We noticed, partially concealed by rubbish in a niche of the wall below the panelling, the corner of a vellum covering. On further examination, this proved to be a MS. copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, not indeed of the most ancient date, but adorned with very rare and curious illumination, and making an excellent addition to the stores of the library. After a tete-à-tete dinner that evening with the friendly bishop, we spent a pleasant hour or two in a thorough inspection of the newly-found treasure.

It was little more than a month afterwards that I heard the great bell in the western tower toll the tidings of a death. One week more, and a sorrowing procession of school-children and women of the almshouses filed from the transept into the quiet cloister-ground, there to bury the last remains of one who would seem to have been to them in life a loving and much-loved friend. It was so. The eager brain and the yearning heart, worn out with unequal labors, were laid to rest for ever. The bishop's frail nursling was dead.

DAVID MATSON.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

WHO of my young friends have read the sorrowful story of Enoch Arden, so sweetly and simply told by the great English poet? It is the story of a man who went to sea, leaving behind a sweet young wife and a little daughter. He was cast away on a desert island, where he remained several years, when he was discovered and taken off by a passing vessel. Coming back to his native town, he found his wife married to an old playmate—a good man, rich and honored, and with whom she was living happily. The poor man, unwilling to cause her pain and perplexity, resolved not to make himself known to her, and lived and died alone.

The poem has reminded me of a very similar story of my own New England neighborhood, which I have often heard, and which I will try to tell, not in poetry, like Alfred Tennyson's, but in my own poor prose. I can assure my readers, that in its main particulars, it is a true tale.

One bright Summer morning, more than than three score years ago, David Matson, with his young wife and two, healthy, barefooted boys, stood on the bank near their dwelling. They were waiting there for Pelatiah Curtis to come round the Point with his wherry, and take the husband and father to the Port a few miles below. The Lively Turtle was about to sail on a voyage to Spain, and David was to go in her as a mate. They stood there in the level morning sunshine talking cheerfully; but had you been near enough, you could have seen tears in Anna Matson's blue eyes, for she loved her husband, and knew there was always danger on the sea. And David's bluff, cheery voice trembled a little now and then, for the honest sailor loved his snug home on the Merrimac, with the dear wife and her pretty boys. But presently the wherry came alongside, and David was just stepping into it, when he turned back to kiss his wife and children once more.

"In with you, man," said Pelatiah Curtis; "there's no time for kissing and such fooleries when the tide serves."

And so they parted. Anna and the boys went back to their home, and David to the Port, whence he sailed off in the Lively Turtle. And months passed; Autumn followed the Summer, and Winter the Autumn, and then Spring came, and anon it was Summer on the river side, and he did not come back. And another passed, and then the old sailors and fishermen shook their heads solemnly, and said the Lively Turtle was a lost ship, and would never come back to port. And poor Anna had her bombazine gown dyed black and her straw bonnet trimmed in mourning ribbons, and thenceforth she was known only as the Widow Matson.

And how was it all this time with David himself? Now you must know that the Mohammedan people of Algiers, and Tripoli, and Mogadore and Sallee, on the Barbary coast, had for a long time been in the habit of fitting out galleys and armed boats to seize upon the merchant vessels of Christian nations, and make slaves of their crews and passengers, just as men calling themselves Christians in America were sending vessels to Africa to catch black slaves for their plantations. The Lively Turtle fell into the hands of one of those roving sea-robbers, and the crew was taken to Algiers, and sold in the Market place as slaves, poor David Matson among the rest.

When a boy he had learned the trade of a ship-carpenter with his father on the Merrimac; and now he was set to work in the dock-yards. His master, who was naturally a kind man, did not overwork him. He had daily his three loaves of bread, and when his clothing was worn out, its place was supplied by the course cloth of wool and camel's hair woven by the Barbary women. Three hours before sunset he was released from work, and Friday, which was the Mahammedan Sabbath was a day of entire rest. Once a year, at the season called Ramadan, he was left at leisure for a whole week.

So time went on—days, weeks, months, and years. His dark hair became gray. He still dreamed of his old home on the Merrimac, and of his good Anna and the boys. He wondered whether they yet lived, what they thought of him, and what they were doing. The hope of ever seeing them grew fainter and fainter, and at last nearly died out; and he resigned himself to his fate as a slave for life.

But one day a handsome, middle-aged gentleman, in the dress of one of his own countrymen, attended by a great officer of the Dey, entered the ship-yard, and called up before him the American captives. The stranger was none other than Joel Barlow, Commissioner of the United States to procure the liberation of slaves belonging to that government. He took the men by the hand as they came up, and told them they were free. As you might expect, the poor fellows were very grateful; some laughed, some wept for joy, some shouted and sang, and threw up their caps, while others, with David Matson among them, knelt down on the chips, and thanked God for the great deliverance.

"This is a very affecting scene," said the Commissioner, wiping his eyes. "I must keep the impression of it for my Columbiad."

And drawing out his tablet, he proceeded to write on the spot an apostrophe to Freedom, which afterwards found a place in his great epic.

David Matson had saved a little money during his captivity by odd jobs and work on holidays. He got a passage to Malaga, where he bought a nice shawl for his wife and a watch for each of the boys. He then went to the quay, where an American ship was lying just ready to sail for Boston.

Almost the first man he saw on board was Pelatiah Curtis, who had rowed him down to the Port seven years before. He found that his old neighbor did not know him, so changed was he with his long beard and Moorish dress, whereupon, without telling his name, he began to put questions about his old home, and finally asked him if he knew a Mrs. Matson.

"I rather think I do," said Pelatiah; "she's my wife."

"Your wife!" cried the other; "she is mine before God and man. I am David Matson, and she is the mother of my children."

"And mine, too," said Pelatiah; "I left her with a baby in her arms. If you are David Matson, your right to her is outlawed; at any rate she is mine, and I'm not the man to give her up."

"God is great!" said poor David Matson, unconsciously repeating the familiar words of Moslem submission; "His will be done. I loved her, but I shall never see her again. Give these, with my blessings, to the good woman and the boys." And he handed over with a sigh the little bundle containing the gifts for his wife and children. He shook hands with his rival.

"Pelatiah," he said, looking back as he left the ship, "be kind to Anna and my boys."

"Ay, ay, sir," responded the sailor, in a careless tone. He watched the poor man passing slowly up the narrow street until out of sight. "It's a hard case for David," he said, helping himself to a fresh quid of tobacco, "but I'm glad I've seen the last of him."

When Pelatiah Curtis reached home, he told Anna the story of her husband, and laid his gifts in her lap. She did not shriek nor faint, for she was a healthy woman with strong nerves; but she stole away by herself and wept bitterly. She lived many years after, but could never be persuaded to wear the pretty shawl which the husband of her youth had sent as his farewell gift. There is, however, a tradition that in accordance with her dying wish, it was wrapped about her poor old shoulders in the coffin and buried with her

The little old bull's eye watch, which is still in the possession of one of her grandchildren, is now all that remains to tell of David Matson—the lost man.—Young Folks.

We think it is Leigh Hunt who tells the story of a "gentleman" in the pit of one of our theatres, who, after allowing a lady to stand by his side during three acts, rose while the curtain was down before the fourth act, and wishing to get some refreshment, with great show of courtesy addressed the lady, and told her she might 'mind his place" until he returned!

NOTICE.

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1865.

LITERATURE OF THE DAILY PRESS.

ALTHOUGH the pages of a daily journal are not, strictly speaking, favorable to the nurture and growth of purely literary genius, clever writers have from time to time made them a medium of expression for their conceits and fancies. Charles Dickens contributed his first sketches to a morning paper. Holmes wrote his best lyric for the Boston Advertiser. That these facts are only appreciated by editors, and that there is a general desire to blend with the "brief chronicle and abstract" of daily affairs the more desultory and fictitious efforts of the literary man, the columns of our daily press abundantly testify. Sometimes a department is devoted especially to this object; most generally a "poet's corner" softly woos the muse of local bards to lighten up a page of advertisements. The Sunday issue of the daily is very apt to be particularly devoted to this purpose—whether from a religious sentiment, complimentary to literature, or whether from the fact that people have more leisure to pernse such matter on Sundays, we are unable to state. It may reasonably be inferred, however, that the Sabbath is supposed to be conducive to literary refreshment; that people are less severe and critical in their tastes on that day; and indeed if we are to jndge from the quality of much Sunday literature, a certain degree of patieuce, tolerance and resiguation seems to have been diffused throughout the reading pnblic.

It was possibly in deference to this custom that the Alta California, on Sunday last, published an article entitled "Men I have met; being adventures in Europe, Asia, Africa, America and Anstralasia," by one W. J. M. It may be easily imagined that a title so remarkable and suggestive of a familiar knowledge of the five great divisions of the globe would be thrilling to most readers. It is true that a work has been published, entitled "People I have met," by a writer whose reputation would imply enviable, interesting and aristocratic acquaintances, and that W. J. M., being comparatively unknown, has not the advantage of premising that the people he has met have heen worth meeting. But the reader who would rush to snch a conjecture would be rash indeed. An attentive perusal of the article would convince him that the men W. J. M. has met are in fact very old friends. We do not mean to infer that there are any actual mortals, born of woman, who converse in the manner recorded by W. J. M., but simply that nearly every character he has introduced has looked at us from the pages of popular novels, and, as such, are perhaps a little too familiar. The principal hero, Col. Fairfax, has so evidently, among his other wanderings, walked out of the pages of one of Lever's novels, that we are quite prepared for anything. If W. J. M. should assert that he had met his friend hobnobbing with the Emperor Napoleon, we should not he startled. It is perfectly natural to learn that he is the "very beau ideal of martial horsemanship, that his broad chest scarcely afforded place for the numerous decorations he wore, among which were several jewelled ornaments—the reward, probably, of services rendered to the native Prince of India;" that he was generally the best soldier in the best armies of Europe, Asia, Africa, America and Australasia; that he is fascinating, mysterious and delightfully piratical. The other characters have an equally familiar aspect. "Neville"—where was there a "Neville" who wasn't deeply interesting—and what novel reader, having read thus far, is not prepared for the intelligence that any languid, fashionable youth may be really a wonderful studeut and energetic man. Alonzo Squiffy, with his interminable stories, belongs to every chronicle of a mess table, and is a military Alfred Jingle.

If anything were wanted to satisfy the reader of his previous acquaintance with these gentlemen, it would be found in the followiug paragraph, which at once invests him with the old atmosphere of the popular novel:

"Pardon me, fairest and most courteous of readers, if I digress to relate with a circumstantiality to which the subject is entitled, the origin and extent of my acquaintance with Colonel Fairfax, and let me also here, once and for all, claim absolution for the many digressions in which I may possibly indulge hereafter. Know then, oh! too indulgent reader of an idle page, that on one fine May morning," etc., etc.

After this formula we have nothing to do but to give ourselves up to ravishing pictures, mysterious adventures, fascinating villains and lovely young countesses. What a vision of thrilling romance is called up by the phrase, "fairest and most courteous reader?" Indeed it is not impossible but that W. J. M. has really constructed a novel, which, under this disguise of a history of travel, is now being published weekly in the Alta.

A companion piece to the above, and another specimen of the literature of the daily press, is the letter of "Frank Wardell," the New York correspondent of the Daily Call. This ingenious writer furnishes nearly a column of purely personal gossip concerning Californians in New York. We are forced to confess that these "Men" who Mr. Wardell has "met," though undoubtedly bona fide individuals, are by no means as interesting as W. J. M.'s fictitious heroes. Yet there is a rough sincerity about Wardell. He evidently has his heroes, but he scorns to throw any romantic or adventitious charm about them. Nothing can be more direct or simple than his chronicle of their movements. Ex gr:

"As I was wandering down Broadway the other evening, I came to the conclusion that I would pop into the Metropolitan Hotel, and see what California birds were perched around on the different seats."

Contrast this Doric simplicity, slightly relieved by playful slang, with the composite ornamentation of W. J. M. What refreshing straightforwardness. Mr. Wardell, wandering down Broadway, concludes to "pop" into the Metropolitan Hotel and make his brother bipeds, which by a playful application of Plato's theory, he calls "birds," the subject of his letter. There is no elaborate description of the hotel, no Ciceronian introduction to his subject, no ridiculous apology to the reader for the use of gross personalities. Mr. Wardell has work before him; he is to classify these California birds, according to their habits and genera. It does not enter his mind that the fact of John Jones being dressed in a linen suit, though of tremendous significance to Wardell, may not be of such thrilling importance to San Francisco as to justify its record in a daily paper. Of course not. It is the introduction of John Jones' name into the letter which gives the whole circumstance an absorbing interest, and Mr. Wardell knows that whoever has seen John Jones, will hang breathlessly upon this statement of his wearing-apparel, or the equally interesting chronicle of his taking a "social smile." To show how bald the mere adventures of Mr. Wardell's heroes are, when divested of this personality, we give the following extracts, with the names carefully expunged:

"—— ——— I met the other morning on Wall street, rushing like a gold broker, perfectly wild. He said he was in an awful hurry; that he had opened a large book house in Albany; doing a smashing business; lots of 'soap;' plenty of customers. Hunkee boy!

"—— ——— I rode up with the other day in the cars. He does not alter much, and, strange to say, although he lives, yet, nevertheless, he dyes. Excuse my personalities.

"—— ——— of ———, is round town in a white linen suit, and they seem to suit ——. I saw ——— and ——— taking a social 'smile.'

"—— ——— I see quite often; he don't seem to grow any stouter. —— is a good fellow, sound on the goose, and never repudiates his regular 'egg-nog' at Rudolph's. Do you, old fellow?

"—— ——— I see sailing around down town very often during the day. The —— still hangs out at Howard Hotel.

"—— ——— is here. I had not time to speak with him except to say, 'How are you?' This is a brother to ——— ———, who is one of the finest gentlemen to be scared up in Frisco."

And so on, usque ad nauseam.

It may he urged that this kind of writing, if not very intellectual, is harmless, and affords some gratification to the acquaintances of the individuals referred to. It is certainly very probable that if it were particularly objectionable, Mr. Wardell would not write it, nor would the Call, usually intelligent, venture to publish it. But we are old-fashioned enough to believe that snch personalities should be restricted to private and not nsed in public correspondence; that if Mr. Brown wishes to hear of the private enterprises, business and social, of his old acquaintances, a daily journal is not the place for him to acquire that information. It is fair to presume that if his acquaintance with John Smith is not intimate enough to keep him fully advised of John Smith's movements, he has no business to learn it from any other source. It has long been a delicate question to what extent the privacy of a public man may be invaded by the newspaper correspondent, and how far a Jenkins may be justified in chronicling his domestic and social movements; but there is no individual mentioned by Frank Wardell whom we believe can fairly claim this helpless and violable popularity.

As we have intimated before, this fault lies not so much with Wardell, or the Call, as with the public. There can be no donbt that this taste for personalities has attained a morbid growth in Calfornia, and that the above is only a specimen of its most presentable and good-humored phase. We do not speak now of the reputation acquired by a certain daily which, under the thin disguise of extra-loyalty, teems with personal blackguardism, and is alteruately feared and fostered. California audiences, at lecture or theatre, are quick to seize upon personalities. Local allusions are interpolated in plays, and "gags" bearings upon the local, political topics of the day, bring down the house. It is in no spirit of carping criticism, or hypercritical fastidiousness that we have devoted so much space to a review of this weakness, but because we conscientiously believe it to be the duty of the public press, not only to forbear from pandering to these follies which beset our young civilization, but to manfully and openly oppose them.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

ON Monday evening last Lucrezia Borgia was performed, Signorina Brambilla assuming the character of the heroine for the first time, but not with her usual success. With all due allowance for the short-comings of a first representation, it is evident that the lady lacks the physical and dramatic vigor, as well as vocal power, for the effective performance of this exacting and tragic role. Her success lies in the quieter scenes, where sentiment, affection and tenderness find expression. Morelli's "Don Alfonso" was admirable. Miss Phillips' "Maffio Orsini" was excellent. The famous "Brindisi" was given with her usual artistic finish.

On Tuesday La Figlia del Reggimento was produced for Signorina Sconcia's benefit, to a house that was a most worthy compliment to the beneficiary, but with imperfections that were not so complimentary to the numerous audience assembled. The opera was shorn of some of its prominent scenes, and was evidently produced without sufficient rehearsal to give it that smoothness of action which has usually attended the productions of this troupe. Even Morelli was at fault, and was rather too exuberant and boisterous as "Sulpuzio." Sbriglia, as "Tonio," was very much out; in fact, almost out of the opera in the last acts. But it was a benefit night, and that is supposed to be an excuse for all remissness. Two original compositions by Signorina Sconcia and a gentleman amateur were very well performed. The duet "La Jota de los Torreros," in character, by Miss Phillips and the beneficiary, was a vivacious little gem of Spanish song, excellently characterized and duly appreciated. It was repeated last night, and was received with equal favor.

On Wednesday evening, I Puritani was given very effectively. Brambilla acted and sang "Elvira" with artistic taste and feeling, and Morelli and Orlandini rendered the celebrated duet, at the end of the second act, with great enthusiasm and power. The concerted finale of the first act was also notably well given.

Signorini Brambilla's benefit, on Thursday evening, was awarded a crowded and brilliant house. The lady's "Casta Diva," and her "Zerlina," in Don Giovanni, were rendered with marked ability. The beneficiary was made the recipient of a set of diamond jewery, prepared by Tucker at a cost of $1,500—a substantial, and to her doubtless a most gratifying, token of the kindly regard of her friends. This is in better taste than the "floral triumphs" and big honqnet ovations so prevalent of late. Rigoletta was sung last night. Lucia will be the performance this afternoon.

Preparations for a grand complimentary benefit, to be tendered to Manager Maguire by the united opera troupe, are in progress.

THE "BROTHER JONATHAN."—The return of the Del Norte places us in possession of all the information we shall probably ever receive of the manner in which the disaster to the Brother Jonathan occurred. The steamer meeting with heavy weather about sixteen miles northwest of Crescent City, the captain determined to seek the shelter of that port until the storm abated. The Alta's correspondent says:

The ship had proceeded seven or eight miles when she struck with full force on a sharp ledge, which, at the lowest ebo, projected about a yard above the surface; the bottom of the steamer went to pieces with a crash. In three minutes, says the wheelsman, the large fragments of the bottom and a part of the rudder were afloat alongside. Captain DeWolf ordered one of the larger boats lowered and filled with passengers, under the First Mate. None of the rescued saw her till she was floating bottom upwards. The Second Mate next lowered a boat filled with female passengers, among whom was Mrs. General Wright, but the steamer careened and upset the boat. Mr. Campbell (the mate) drew up such of the ladies as he could reach from the steamer's chains. It was now fifteen minutes since the collision, and the steamer was fast breaking to pieces. Mr. Patterson, (the Third Mate,) who was asleep when the crash came, now lowered his small boat, and hurried on board five women and three children who were nearest at hand. Ten of the crew leaped after him. The load was large for the boat, and she dipped incessantly. Two guns were fired just after the boat left, and fifteen minutes later the steamer disappeared under the billows. There were two boats on the deck when the Third Mate left, but owing to the terrible violence of the sea it is not probable that either of them could have been launched. The citizens of Crescent City immediately sent out boats, but found it utterly impossible to go within six miles of the wreck. It was not until Wednesday afternoon that the locality could be reached.

No more lives were saved than than heretofore reported, and only three bodies had been found at the last advices.

BARNUM'S MUSEUM BURNED.—A fire broke out in this well known institution on the morning of July 14th, which destroyed the building and nearly all its contents. The original New York Museum was established by Scudder, but after his death was purchased by Barnum, about 1836, and has since been most successfully engineered by this great showman. For awhile he had a rival in Peale's Museum, located on Broadway, opposite the Park; but Barnum soon extinguished the competing Peale, and has since had the museum business in New York to himself. It was in this institution our infant mind was first terrified with stuffed crocodiles, wild men of the woods, wax monstrosities, and other horrors that mingle with our earliest recollections, and we owe it this brief obitnary.

THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELISTS.

[Anxious to keep up the literary standard of The Californian, its proprietors have, at an enormous expense, recently engaged the principal novelists of Europe and America to contribute to its columns. In view of the objections sometimes offered to "Only a Clod" and other continued tales, arrangements have been made with the different authors to condense their stories into a space that shall not exceed two columns of our paper. By this means The Californian will be enabled to offer its readers a three-volume novel in a single issue, or so to speak, a seventy-five cent book for ten cents. By the last steamer, we have received our fifth installment, from the pen of two of our most popular writers, which we give below:]

SELINA SEDILIA.

BY MISS M. E. B—DD—N AND MRS. H—N—Y W—D.

CHAPTER I.

THE sun was setting over Sloperton Grange and reddened the window of the lonely chamber in the western tower, supposed to be haunted by Sir Edward Sedilia, the founder of the Grange. In the dreamy distance arose the gilded mausoleum of Lady Felicia Sedilia, who haunted that portion of Sedilia Manor, known as "Stiff-uns Acre. A little to the left of the Grange might have been seen a mouldering ruin, known as "Guy's Keep," haunted by the spirit of Sir Guy Sedilia, who was found, one morning, crushed by one of the fallen battlements. Yet, as the setting sun gilded these objects, a beautiful and almost holy calm seem diffused about the Grange.

The Lady Selina sat by an oriel window, overlooking the park. The sun sank gently in the bosom of the German Ocean, and yet the lady did not lift her beautiful head from the finely curved arm and diminutive hand which supported it. When darkness finally shrouded the landscape, she started, for the sound of horse-hoofs clattered over the stones of the avenue. She had scarcely risen before an aristocratic young man fell on his knees before her.

"My Selina!"

"Edgardo! You here?"

"Yes, dearest."

"And—you—you—have—seen nothing?" said the lady in an agitated voice and nervous manner, turning her face aside to conceal her emotion.

"Nothing—that is nothing of any account," said Edgardo. "I passed the ghost of your aunt in the park, noticed the spectre of your uncle in the ruined keep, and observed the familiar features of the spirit of your great-grandfather at his post. But nothing beyond these trifles, my Selina. Nothing more, love, absolutely nothing."

The young man turned his dark liquid orbs fondly upon the ingenuous face of his betrothed.

"My own Edgardo!—and you still love me? You still would marry me in spite of this dark mystery which surrounds me? In spite of the fatal history of my race? In spite of the ominous predictions of my aged nurse?"

"I would, Selina;" and the young man passed his arm around her yielding waist. The two lovers gazed at each other's faces in unspeakable bliss. Suddenly Selina started.

"Leave me, Edgardo! leave me! A mysterious something—a fatal misgiving—a dark ambiguity—an equivocal mistrust oppresses me. I would be alone!"

The young man arose and cast a loving glance on the lady. "Then we will be married on the seventeenth."

"The seventeenth," repeated Selina, with a mysterious shudder.

They embraced and parted. As the clatter of hoofs in the courtyard died away, the Lady Selina sank into the chair she had just quitted.

"The seventeenth," she repeated slowly, with the same fatal shudder. "Ah!—what if he should know that I have another husband living? Dare I reveal to him that I have two legitimate and three natural children? Dare I repeat to him the history of my youth? Dare I confess that at the age of seven I poisoned my sister, by putting verdigris in her cream-tarts—that I threw my cousin from a swing at the age of twelve? That the lady's maid who incurred the displeasure of my girlhood now lies at the bottom of the horse-pond? No! no! he is too pure—too good—too innocent, to hear such improper conversation!" and her whole body writhed as she rocked to and fro in a paroxysm of grief.

But she was soon calm. Rising to her feet, she opened a secret panel in the wall, and revealed a slow-match ready for lighting.

"This match," said the Lady Selina, "is connected with a mine beneath the western tower, where my three children are confined, another branch of it lies under the parish church, where the record of my first marriage is kept. I have only to light this match and the whole of my past life is swept away!" She approached the match with a lighted candle.

But a hand was laid upon her arm, and with a shriek the Lady Selina fell on her knees before the spectre of Sir Guy.

CHAPTER II.

"Forbear, Selina," said the phantom in, a hollow voice.

"Why should I forbear?" responded Selina haughtily, as she recovered her courage. "You know the secret of our race?"

"I do. Understand me—I do not object to the eccentricities of your youth. I know the fearful fate which, pursuing you, led you to poison your sister and drown your lady's maid. I know the awful doom which I have brought upon this house! But if you make way with these children—"

"Well," said the Lady Selina, hastily.

"They will haunt you!"

"Well, I fear them not!" said Selina, drawing her superb figure to its full height.

"But what place are they to haunt? The ruin is sacred to your uncle's spirit. Your aunt monopolizes the park, and I must be allowed to state not unfrequently trespasses upon the grounds of others. The horsepond is frequented by the spirit of your maid, and your murdered sister walks these corridors. To be plain, there is no room at Sloperton Grange for another ghost. I cannot have them in my room—for you know I don't like children. Think of this, rash girl, and forbear! Would you, Selina," said the phantom mournfully, "would you force your great-grandfather's spirit to take lodgings elsewhere?"

Lady Selina's hand trembled; the lighted candle fell from her nerveless fingers.

"No," she cried passionately; "Never!" and fell fainting to the floor.

CHAPTER III.

Edgardo galloped rapidly towards Sloperton. When the outline of the Grange had faded away in the darkness, he reined his magnificent steed beside the ruins of Gray's Keep.

"It wants but a few moments of the hour," he said, consulting his watch by the light of the moon. "He dare not break his word. He will come." He paused, and peered anxiously into the darkness. "But come what may, she is mine," he continued, as his thoughts reverted fondly to the fair lady he had quitted. "Yet, if she knew all. If she knew that I were a disgraced and ruined man—a felon and an outcast. If she knew that at the age of fourteen I murdered my Latin tutor and forged my uncle's will. If she knew that I had three wives already, and that the fourth victim of misplaced confidence and my unfortunate peculiarity is expected to be at Sloperton by to-night's train with her baby. But no; she must not know it. Constance must not arrive. Burke the Slogger must attend to that."

"Ha! here he is! Well?"

These words were addressed to a ruffian in a slouched hat, who suddenly appeared from Guy's Keep.

"I be's here, measter," said the villain, with a disgracefully low accent and complete disregard of grammatical rules.

"It is well. Listen: I'm in possession of facts that will send you to the gallows. I know of the murder of Bill Smithers, the robbery of the toll-gate keeper, and the making away of the youngest daughter of Sir Reginald De Walton. A word from me, and the officers of justice are on your track."

Burke the Slogger trembled.

"Hark ye! serve my purpose, and I may yet save you. The 5:30 train from Clapham will be due at Sloperton at 9:25. It must not arrive!"

The villain's eyes sparkled as he nodded at Edgardo.

"Enough—you understand; leave me!"

CHAPTER IV.

About half a mile from Sloperton Station the South Clapham and Medway line crossed a bridge over Sloperton-on-Trent. As the shades of evening were closing, a man in a slouched hat might have been seen, carrying a saw and axe under his arm, hanging about the bridge. From time to time he disappeared in the shadow of its abutments, but the sound of a saw and axe still betrayed his vicinity. At exactly nine o'clock he re-appeared, and crossing to the Sloperton side, rested his shoulder against the abutment and gave a shove. The bridge swayed a moment, and then fell with a splash into the water, leaving a space of one hundred feet between the two banks. This done, Burke the Slogger—for it was he—with a fiendish chuckle seated himself on the divided railway track and awaited the coming of the train.

A shriek from the woods announced its approach. For an instant Burke the Slogger saw the glaring of a red lamp. The ground trembled. The train was going with fearful rapidity. Another second and it had reached the bank. Burke the Slogger uttered a fiendish laugh. But the next moment the train leaped across the chasm, striking the rails exactly even, and dashing out the life of Burke the Slogger, sped away to Sloperton.

The first object that greeted Edgardo as he rode up to the station on the arrival of the train, was the body of Burke the Slogger hanging on the cow-catcher; the second was the face of his deserted wife looking from the windows of a second-class carriage.

CHAPTER V.

A nameless terror seemed to have taken possession of Clarissa, Lady Selina's maid, as she rushed into the presence of her mistress.

"O, my lady, such news!"

"Explain yourself," said her mistress rising.

"An accident has happened on the railway, and a man has been killed."

"What—not Edgardo!" almost screamed Selina.

"No, Burke the Slogger!" your ladyship.

"My first husband!" said Lady Seliua, sinking on her knees. "Just Heaven, I thank thee!"

CHAPTER VI.

The morning of the seventeenth dawned brightly over Sloperton. "A fine day for the wedding," said the sexton to Swipes, the butler of Sloperton Grange. The aged retainer shook his head sadly. "Alas! there's no trusting in signs!" he continued. "Seventy-five years ago, on a day like this, my young mistress—" but he was cut short by the appearance of a stranger.

"I would see Sir Edgardo," said the new-comer, impatiently.

The bridegroom, who with, the rest of the wedding-train, was about stepping into the carriage to proceed to the parish church, drew the stranger aside.

"It's done!" said the stranger, in a hoarse whisper.

"Ah! and you buried her?"

"With the others!"

"Enough. No more at present. Meet me after the ceremony, and you shall have your reward."

The stranger shuffled away, and Edgardo returned to his bride. "A trifling matter of business I had forgotten, my dear Selina; let us proceed;" and the young man pressed the timid hand of his blushing bride as he handed her into the carriage. The cavalcade rode out of the courtyard. At the same moment, the deep bell on Guy's Keep tolled ominously.

CHAPTER VII.

Scarcely had the wedding-train left the Grange, than Alice Sedilia, youngest daughter of Lady Selina, made her escape from the western tower, owing to a lack of watchfulness on the part of Clarissa. The innocent child, freed from restraint, rambled through the lonely corridors, and finally, opening a door, found herself in her mother's boudoir. For some time she amused herself by examining the various ornaments and elegant trifles with which it was filled. Then, in pursuance of a childish freak, she dressed herself in her mother's laces and ribbons. In this occupation she chanced to touch a peg which proved to be a spring that opened a secret panel in the wall. Alice uttered a cry of delight as she noticed what, to her childish fancy, appeared to be the slow-match of a fire-work. Taking a lucifer match in her hand she approached the fuse. She hesitated a moment. What would her mother and her nurse say?

Suddenly the ringing of the chimes of Sloperton parish church met her ear. Alice knew that the sound signified that the marriage party had entered the church, and that she was secure from interruption. With a childish smile upon her lips, Alice Sedilia touched off the slow-match.

CHAPTER VIII.

At exactly two o'clock on the seventeenth, Rupert Sedilia, who had just returned from India, was thoughtfully descending the hill toward Sloperton manor. "If I can prove that my aunt Lady Selina was married before my father died, I can establish my claim to Sloperton Grange," he uttered, half aloud. He paused, for a sudden trembling of the earth beneath his feet, and terrific explosion as of a park of artillery, arrested his progress. At the same moment he beheld a dense cloud of smoke envelope the churchyard of Sloperton, and the western tower of the Grange seemed to be lifted bodily from its foundation. The air seemed filled with falling fragments, and two dark objects struck the earth close at his feet. Rupert picked them up. One seemed to be a heavy volume bound in brass.

A cry burst from his lips.

"The Parish Records." He opened the volume hastily. It contained the marriage of Lady Selina to "Burke the Slogger."

The second object proved to be a piece of parchment. He tore it open with trembling fingers. It was the missing will of Sir James Sedilia!"

CHAPTER IX.

When the bells again rang on the new parish church of Sloperton it was for the marriage of Sir Rupert Sedilia and his cousin, the only remaining members of the family.

Five more ghosts were added to the supernatural population of Sloperton Grange. Perhaps this was the reason why Sir Rupert sold the property shortly afterward, and that for many years a dark shadow seemed to hang over the ruins of Sloperton Grange.

THE END.

The Fair opened on Thursday night most propitiously, to an assemblage of fifteen hundred people. Contributions in large numbers are still being received, and the Pavilion promises to be the fashionable resort of the city for weeks to come

WHERE OUR MODERN ANGELS WEAR THEIR WINGS.

Angels have wings; now, as of old,
Those who on earth appear,
As signs of their celestial birth,
White, spotless wings still wear.

But now the fashion 's somewhat changed—
Like Mercury's, their wings
Are worn upon their hats—in view—
The saucy little things!

'Tis well that they their wings should show,
But sure 'tis to be dreaded
That wings upon their hats may make
The pretty dears light-headed. [Puck.

SPECIMENS OF NEGRO LETTER-WRITING.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Springfield Republican. speaking of the letters of the negro soldiers around Vicksburg, says: On many of the letters it is common to see this announcement, "a souldiers leter to his hom in hast." Some of the envelopes are written all over—it costs them so many words to express their meaning. I have seen the word Mississippi written out in full three times on the face of one envelope. It was impossible to tell to whom one letter belonged, although the whole surface was covered with writing. Some are directed as follows: "a Sonljers letur to his hom dont open this but Give it to him in hast ef ye please." I copy the following from a letter which I brought from the office this morning: "mr aron Felds vixburg misipi 49 Culard infruntiry regmints Compt D Ceare of Capten Crotch" [Roch]. The different ways in which they pronounce the word chaplain are humorous and amusing. Besides the proper way, they twist my title into the following: "Chapteu, chapter, chaptel, chapel, chapler, chaplel, chaper, chapner. chapman, and chapen." Of these, the most common forms of address are "Mr. Chapter," or "Mr. Chapel." We have three men in our regiment who have studied at Oberlin, but their attainments do not speak well for that institution. One of these professes to know German, French and Latin; but after several tests I am convinced that he does not know which is which. During the month of March I wrote one hundred letters for my men, besides reading all they received. The first is not a pleasant task, and the second is both unpleasant and difficult. Sometimes it is simply impossible to make out what was attempted to be written. The writing of Rufus Choate was as legible as printing, compared with the specimens that are sometimes brought to me to be read. I copy one illustration from a large pile before me: "vxurgmis the For 9 u mis an rad im a Ganof my Word im in hop darmis find her ofyo Worde itis myalda suddy miuitdree Leada of yor sisbil the sitofyo darmis," etc. etc. I defy any printer to make out the original, of which there were two cap pages full. The letters had no form, and had to be deciphered or guessed at, as well as the sense. The following is a translation of what is written above: "Vicksburg, Miss., Camp 49th U. S. C. I. Miss Ann Reed: I am a gentleman of my word, and I am in hopes, dear Miss, to find you a lady of your word. It is my all-day study, my night's dream, to be worthy of a lady of your ability. The sight of you, dear miss," etc. I am ashamed to say that I spent four precious hours in deciphering this letter. But I was anxious to see if anything could be made of it. When the marks on the sheet cannot be read, I generally inquire who the letter is from, and then read off something in which the listener is greatly interested. But whether it is like anything that is written or not, I defy any one to tell.

But of silly things some of their love letters are most sickening. Violets, molasses and sugar are their three degrees of comparison when they express affection for their sweethearts. The following couplet I have written for them dozens of times:

"As grass is green around a stump
I choose you for my sugar lump."

One wrote to his girl as follows: "I have something nice for you; what do you think it is? Why this piece of poetry:

"Dig my grave both wide and deep
Marble stone at my head and feet
In the middle thy turtle dove
Show this world that I died for love."

I go deeper into my pile, and find the following, which is a fair sample of this sort of letters:

"Dear and hanson luvor i Can not help to say that I does luv yo four I does you air my hold hart delite to think of yo boot day and Night

the Night is dark and I am on gard but still I can think of yo very hard the See is dark and wide too but still my luv is true to yo the Rose is Red the Vilet blu
Shugor is Sweet and so is yo
i am a army Soldier and that is very tru but that is not noo reason i Should not have no love for yo god bless yo my deer you mus not forget to ansor this letter this is awl at Present to you deer."

"FANCY," said Sydney Smith, to some ladies, when he was told that one of the giraffes at the Zoological Gardens had caught a cold, "a giraffe with two yards of sore throat."

LITERATURE AND ART.

THE following are among the volumes to be issued during this and the next season by Ticknor & Fields: A novel by Charles Kingsley, called "Hereward the Last of the English," "Recollections of Seventy Years," by Mrs. John Farreu, an autobiography of great promise, as the lady has known most of the leading writers in England, France, and America, personally; "Henry Thoreau's Letters," to be edited by R. W. Emerson; Jean Paul's "Hesperus," translated by Brooks; "Treasures from the Prose Writings of John Milton;" a second series of "Spare Hours," by Dr. John Brown; "Life and Letters of Frederick Robertson," of Brighton, England; "Matthew Arnold's Essays," a volume containing, besides what he has collected in the English edition, his papers on Homer, Freueh, Eton, etc., making a volume twice the size of the London book; "St. Martin's Summer," by Miss Brewster, author of "Compensation;" "Honor May," a new novel of much promise; "Geological sketches," by Agassiz; "Atlantic Tales;" a beautiful new edition of Tennyson's poems, with steel engravings; "Breathings of the Better Life," edited by Lucy Larcom; a new complete edition of Whittier's prose works; "Spheres of Life and Duty," by Dr. Chapin; Dora Greenwell's poems; Christina Rosetti's poems; "Seaside Studies in Natural History," by Mr. and Mrs. Agassiz; new "Juveniles," by Carleton and Gail Hamilton; and Dante's great poem translated by Mr. Longfellow.

THE admirers of Tennyson have been disappointed in most of the portraits of him, as failing to express the refinement of sentiment and depth of reflection characteristic of his mind. At last (says the Transcript) a satisfactory likeness appears. It was executed by an intimate friend of Mr. Tennyson, and as a labor of love—two conditions which account for the remarkable success achieved. This painting is the work of G. L. Watts, an artist of high rank, and a man of wealth, whose object in undertaking it was to present to the English nation a permanent artistic memorial of their greatest living poet. It is a grand head—the broad and lofty brow, the long dark hair, the flowing beard and the loving deep eye are all expressive of the poetic character; while the likeness is pronounced by Tennyson's friends by far the best. Mr. John M'Clure, who is aware, from his long residence in this country, of the great popularity of Tennyson, has purchased the plate of an admirable line-engraving of this beautiful portrait, by J. Stephenson of London, and will soon publish it by subscription.

F. B. CARPENTER, who painted the "First Reading of the Emancipation Proclamation before the Cabinet," has received commissions from Chicago and Cincinnati for full-length portraits of the late President. Robert Lincoln says, in a recent letter to Mr. Carpenter: "My mother and myself both have always considered the portrait of my father the best and most natural that has been made, and its value to us would be inestimable."

ROGERS, the sculptor, who was recently married, left for Europe, with his bride. He will be absent several months, and will visit the principal continental cities before he returns.

KUNTZE has finished a statuette of William Cullen Bryant, of the size of his Shakspeare, and will soon begin a companion-piece, a statuette of Longfellow.

WARD is engaged on a bust of William T. Blodgett, which is a spirited and faithful likeness.

LAUNT THOMPSON has recently executed a bust of the late Thomas Tileston, and also one of the late A. B. Sands.

THE DRESS OF THE HAMBURG PEOPLE.—A letter from Europe, published in the Ohio State Journal, gives the following description of the style of dressing of the people of the Free City of Hamburg: "The drssses of the different classes, or castes in society in this city strikes an American as being very singular. The servant girls have their special dress, so have the chambermaids, nurses, serving-women, menservants, carriage-drivers, porters, etc., etc.; each one has his or her distinctive and unmistakable style of dress, or uniform, as it more properly should be called. In the markets may be found at any time the Vierlanders (pronounced Feer-lenders,) a sect of people who preserve an unique and singular style of dress in vogue now for many centuries. The women wear a singularly formed bodice, which fits closely from the shoulders to the hips—then a skirt scarcely reaching to the knees, then the hose are woolen, and of all imaginable colors; the girls and single women apparently preferring a striped skirt and scarlet hose. The head is covered by a hugely wide-brimmed straw hat: the brim being folded so as to conceal the crown—this hat is tied under the chin, with ribbons at least four inches wide. The hair is often put up in two plaits and hangs straight down the back almost to the knees—others braid the hair, and put it up in more modern styles, but place on the back of the head instead of a "waterfall" a stiff kind of black material about four inches broad, so as to project at least a foot on each side of the head, and two more points of equal breadth hanging down the back from eighteen inches to two feet."

"WIT AND WISDOM FROM WEST AFRICA."—Such is the title of a "Book of Proverbial Philosophy, Idioms, Enigmas, and Laconisms," compiled by the famous traveller, Captain Richard F. Burton, and recently published in London. The Athenæum says of it:

The proverbs relating to woman are expressive of the contempt in which she is held in all savage societies. The following are specimens of many: "A woman who has lost her rival has no sorrow;" (from the dramatists of ancient Greece to those of our own time this has been a favorite estimate of woman;) "Trust not a woman; she will tell theo what she just told her companion;" "If thou givest thy heart to a woman she will kill thee;" "Whatever be thy intimacy, never give thy heart to a woman;" "If a man tells his secrets to his wife, she will bring him in the way of Satan;" "A woman never brings a man into the right way;" "Men who listen to what women say are counted as women;" "He who marries a beauty marries trouble." Some of the moral aphorisms contained in the volume show that the negro at least knows a certain portion of the whole duty of man. "Not to know is bad, not to wish to know is worse," is sound doctrine. Respect for experience and age is declared thus: "Man should take as companion one older than himself." "Lies, however numerous, will be caught by truth when it rises up," and "When the mouth stumbles it is worse than the foot," show proper disdain for falsehood; but other proverbs express a corresponding tenderness for liars who do not tell more untruths than are absolutely necessary. Of such the following are examples: "To flatter one who separates us is good, but it is better to flatter one who strikes us;" "If a great man should wrong you, smile upon him." The poet Campbell would have approved the following statement: "Hope is the pillar of the world." A fine sense of honor makes itself felt in this reflection: "When your relation dies you do not die, but if he is disgraced you are disgraced." In each of the following sentences the moral is excellent: "He who injures another, injures himself;" "He that forgives gains the victory in the dispute;" "If God should compute our sins we should perish;" "He who does not love his neighbor acts maliciously." The African's natural politeness appears in the direction, "One should not press a full man to eat," and in "'I have forgotten thy name,' is better than 'I know thee not.'" The courage of despair is pointed at by "He who wishes to blow out his brains need not fear their being blown out by others." Here the negro's sociability speaks: "A bad person is better than an empty house;" and here is a note of that constitutional sadness which is the shadow of his mirthfulness: "Thought breaks the heart."

DIDN'T SUIT.—Many years ago there resided in a town in one of the Western States, twelve jovial old citizens, who met on the first of every January for social and convivial intercourse. Wine, wit, good will towards themselves and "the rest of mankind," reigned around their ample board. At one of these re-unions, a proposition was offered and unanimously concurred in, that each member should state the character and qualities of his wife, without concealment, be the same good or otherwise. The disclosures commenced, and each one pictured in glowing terms the amiable belougings of his better half. One, however, member S ——, remained silent and absorbed apparently in deep reflection. He was urged to respond to the common pledge, but still remained obstinately reticent. At last, on being assured and reassured that what he disclosed would never be mentioned outside of the precincts of the club, he said, "Gentlemen, you have given flattering, even angelic descriptions of your wives, and I have no doubt each one of you have told the truth. Mrs. —— and myself have lived together harmoniously for forty years. She is an exemplary wife, a kind mother, a good Christian and charitable to the poor; her hand and heart are ever open to the afflicted; her neighbors, and all who know her, say she possesses every lovely attribute that should adorn female character; but confound my eyes if she suits me."

DEATH BY THE GUILLOTINE.—He (Sanson) repeated again and again that the amount of physical suffering from the fall of the axe and the separation of the head from the body, was esseutially small—that death was instantaneous—that in the whole of his experience he had never seen a voluntary motion of the muscles after decapitation—that the stories of the opening and closing of the eyelids after execution were inventions contradicted by the whole of his observations, without a single example to the contrary—that the extinction of feeling and of life followed the fatal event immediately and without a single exceptional case.—Cornhill Magazine.

THE LATEST "SELL."—"A beautiful day, Mr. Jenkins?" "Yes, very pleasant, indeed." "Good day for the race." "Race, what race?" "The human race." "Oh! go along with you stupid jokes; get up a good one, like the one which I sold Day." "Day, what Day?" "The day we celebrate," said Jenkins, who went on his way, rejoicing that he had "got eaen."

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyaus! thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

THEATRICAL TALK.

THE Workmen of San Francisco was played at Maguire's Opera Hoase until Wednesday evening, when it was withdrawn, and the sensation drama of Leah the Forsaken took its place. Mrs. Sophie Edwin's impersonation of the chief character was remarkably effective, and displayed great tragic power. "The curse" was thrilling; Mr. Charles Thorne played "Joseph" admirably, and all the characters of the drama were well acted. On Friday, Waiting for the Verdict was revived for the benefit of one of the most faithful, painstaking and correct actresses on the American or any other stage. The public were of course only too glad to have an opportunity to testify their appreciation of the talent and untiring efforts for their amusement of the actress of whom all California is so justly proud, and the house was crowded to its utmost capacity. Of Mrs. Sophie Edwin's impersonation of "Martha Roseblade" I spoke on a former occasion. This afternoon and evening the same popular piece will be performed.

On Monday, Mr. George Panncefort, an actor who, during the short time he has been at Maguire's Opera House, has done quite sufficient to prove how sterling an artist he is, takes a benefit previous to his departure for Marysville. Aurora Floyd is chosen for the occasion. Mr. Pauncefort will make a capital "John Mellish" and the piece will be produced with fully as strong a cast as at any previous time in this city. I hope Mr. Pauncefort will have a crowded house. He has richly deserved such a mark of public favor, and the entertainment offered on the occasion should, setting aside the merits of the beneficiary, ensure a large attendance.

The opera season drawing to a close, Mr. Maguire opens the winter dramatic campaign with three armies of actors. There is no good reason why cities of the size of Sacramento and Marysville should not be able to support a theatre to amuse them during the winter months, and Mr. Maguire intends to try the experiment, and see whether, instead of depending for amusement on seven-up and whisky drinking, the good people of the valley will not give such liberal support to dramatic companies fully as talented as the one which will fall to the share of the people of the Bay City, as to enable him to give them a theatrical season every year. Sacramento and Marysville both possess fine theatres, and it will be their own fault if the doors are allowed to remain closed. The beautiful new theatre just completed at Marysville will be opened on Thursday next, the drama of Waiting for the Verdict being chosen for the occasion. The opening address has been written, and will be delivered by Mr. Walter M. Leman. All the unemployed actors in the State have been drafted into Mr. Maguire's great dramatic army. Stockton, Grass Valley, Nevada and other interior towns will not be left out in the cold, but will have first-class amusement provided for their winter evenings. San Francisco is even going to spare Mrs. Sophie Edwin for a short season, during which Mr. Dan Setchell will prevent us weeping over our loss by keeping us constantly laughing. It is considered somewhat of a feat to play three games of chess simultaneously, on as many different boards. I wonder if Mr. Tom Maguire, who can move an opera troupe, three dramatic troupes and a minstrel company, and win the game every time, wouldn't beat Harwitz or Paul Morphy at chess.

If the Eureka Theatre is ever again allowed to remain closed for any length of time, it will assuredly not be owing to any lack of energy in Manager Wheatleigh to make it a permanently popular resort. On Wednesday "Trem's" extravaganza, which is really a good deal like "Hamlet's" (not "Trem's") mouse-trap, serving to catch the opinion of the public with regard to the establishing of an empire in Mexico, was produced. It is a hit, a very palpable hit, as may be ascertained by listening to the shouts of boisterous applause which peal forth from the Eureka, and sound on Montgomery street like distant thunder. It presents a most satisfactory solution of the Mexican difficulty, which appears to be unanimously accepted by the audience. The Chinese song of Miss Yeamans, in the character of "Hung Wing," accompanied by a Chinese orchestra, is an immense feature; the audience actually yell with delight and mirth. Miss Yeamans appears in a superb maudarin's dress, and cannot actually be distinguished from a real Simon-pure Chinaman. Mr. Wheatleigh's "Uncle Sam" is capital, and the sharp satire of the text receives full justice delivered by him. Mrs. Fanny Morgan Phelps, as the "Chevalier Monroe," is superb in her handsome chevalier's dress, and acts with much spirit. Mr. Percy makes "Maxamiliano" a most weak-minded monarch, and he and Miss Gass, as the strong-minded Empress, cause much laughter in many amusing scenes. Mr. Leach, as "Benjamin the Wandering Jew," ex-Secretary of the C. S. A., is immensely funny; his performance on the Hebrew lyre is ravishingly beautiful. Mr. Reeves makes up capitally for Duke Gwin, whom he in figure resembles. Mrs. Judah, as the court fortune-teller, delivers the oracles of fate most impressively; she was greeted with much applause. On the first night of its presentation this extravaganza met with the fate of all metrical dramatic productions—it was most sadly dealt with. The rhyme having now been perfectly studied, runs quite smoothly on its feet, the points are brought out, the puns made palpable, and the extravaganza bids fair to prove the great dramatic hit of the season. The closing tableau, in which Miss Louise Clarkson impersonates Mexico, and looks so pretty that no one can wonder Monroe fights for her, is very beautiful. Monroe, his work accomplished, stands by her side, his foot on the Imperial crown; Max accepts the situation, shakes hands with Uncle Sam, who wishes him bon voyage to Europe, and all ends well. The next novelty to be produced at the Eureka is a comedy by "Inigo," entitled My Friend from Victoria. The well-known ability of the author is sufficient guarantee that the dialogue will be sharp and lively. He has doubtless displayed sufficient skill in the laying out of scenes and construction of the plot to make it act well and ensure its success, as he has gone through a short but earnest course of study in those matters. I have but little doubt this comedy will be perfect in all its parts. It will be produced during the early part of next week. This afternoon a Maxamiliano Levee will be held, when his Imperial Majesty will receive the ladies and rising generation at court. This amusing piece will be played this evening, and for many an evening to come I should judge, from the crowds which flock nightly to witness it. This evening, in addition to the extravaganza, the glorious, rollicking comedy of the Wild Irish Girl will be produced, Mrs. Fanny Morgan Phelps appearing in the character of the Hibernian mad-cap, singing Irish songs and dancing Irish jigs.

In Wilson's circuses within circuses, five joined in one, a magnificent hippodromical spectacle is presented. I rather fancy "Jas. Cooke's Royal Circus" is not in strict accordance with the Monroe Doctrine, but as it is perhaps a little joke like the Imperial institution in Mexico, no patriot need object to it. Siegrist's wonderful dogs have a wide field now; they are the pets of the public. Turpin's Ride to York, a grand equestrian spectacle, with new costumes, scenery, etc., is to be produced Monday night, on which occasion Black Bess will make her début before a San Francisco congregation.

TOUCHSTONE.

[For the Californian.]

HOW TO SING.

THAT young lady to whose vocal entertainment I have just been listening, is entirely unconscious what memories she has startled in me. She is young and not beautiful, is in delicate health as I learn, is just from the atmosphere of the young ladies' boarding school, is very crude in her wisdom and doesn't sing half so well as she imagines. All young ladies from boarding schools sing. It seems as if it were a law of all such establishments, never to recognize any possibility in the reality of the parable of the "talents." So, all that come into that company, must be favored alike, and the most unmathematical heads must attempt to manage innumerable figures; the lips, that will never lisp grammatically their vernacular, must take on new sweetness in foreign utterances, and throats that were made especially for food and medicine must open to let out the latent tones that may be too deeply concealed. Academical commencement days turn out on the world's stage such cornucopiæ of sweet lispers, it is a wonder we find greater joy in listening to foreign artists.

All this has very little to do with my subject, which is more personal; but this young lady who insisted upon accepting a feeble invitation—when I wished all the time that she wouldn't—has diverted my attention from what is most interesting to every one—self. I will add, in losing sight and hearing of this young person, that it is probable she would save herself a great deal of trouble, and her friends considerable anxiety, if she would not sing any more in social circles. If she is persistent, I wish for her a happier fate than her single blessedness; and, when more ripened years are hers, that she may be led to the altar by some appreciative person, be he Jew or Gentile—better perhaps the latter—best of all one of that peculiarly musical persuasion, the Methodist, one who thinks "Coronation" and "Brattle Street" reach the acme of sacred music. Here are my hands lifted up to bless her as she enters the church.

And these memories which her singing awoke! They are scattered at intervals over the period of my unillustrious life. Because I was a singer in my youth, what pains has it cost my maturity! Little girls and I used to sing together then, at picnics, in Sunday-schools, and at parties, whence we were sent home early. It's not out of my recollection now, how I used to be called up to the piano to fill up some awful vacuum which existed in a chorus. It was a flattery which made a deep impression on my mind. And it turned out curiously enough, as other's experience will avouch, that I never learned what an inharmonious noise I must have made in those days, until I was a good way beyond my possible singing days. I can't help letting out this little secret, which I knew nothing about then, that all this fine singing of mine, all these occasions when I earned pattings upon the back, and parental flatteries, was before the time that I had outgrown my "childish treble." This should not provoke a smile. It was indicative of great innocence. It scarcely seems possible now, but that young idea, that I was a tenor of considerable merit, went along with me a good while, and chiefly, I suppose, because there happened an interval when I made no vocal attempts. Afterwards, and not many years ago either, it happened that a musical fever attacked the locality where I staid. It was contagious, of course, to one who knew somewhat of that art. The enthusiasm and sympathy of young communities concentrate and develop best in a "club." So a club of ambitious amateurs was formed with wonderful rapidity. One must try to learn the temper of his steel before the battle; and, naturally enough, there must be a trial of voices and an assignment of parts, when the club came to be formed. I listened to others' attempts, fearful of no personal catastrophe. I was conscious that I knew a thing or two. I did stand up, however, for the assignment of my part, and, as I raised my voice, the amusement depicted upon others' faces was fully equalled by the consternation and embarrassment which I felt. The tones were not what I thought I had reason to expect. There was no name in the musical vocabulary by which my voice could be classified. It fell short of tenor, by a rare mingling of unmistakable bass in the same note, and attempts to fulfill the requirements of the bass clef had singular terminations in angular movements of the voice in the regions alternately of soprano and baritone. To tell a sad truth, there seemed to be a deficiency in my control of the organ of sound. I was to myself an outsider, much like lookers-on at the fireworks, when no one can tell the direction the fiery missiles will take, nor if rockets will burst in snakes of fire or golden stars.

It was not decided at that time what part had better be assigned to me in that musical sodality. I remember that my friends, who would come and drink my ale, spoke seldom to me afterwards of musical matters, and having lost some little confidence in myself, the thought of what prizes my voice was to gain for me went away like a bad dream.

Perhaps I ought not to charge upon this ambitious young lady whom I have mentioned, that her tones beat a reveille to the unpleasant memories of my youth. She did not mean to. But they came flocking up to me in such troops that I cannot count them all, nor even recount the whole story of a single one. If blushes were a balm to wounded vanity, I fear I should be charged hereafter with intemperance of living. For to one's embarrassment it seems as if one could do not too great penance. It would be a beatitude to me if I could pass back again before the years of manhood and sing again those childless verses which are set to simple airs. I would call out to that former voice of mine to come back, if it would avail. It has gone away like a pleasant spirit. This voice of to-day would not recognize its father, that youthful tenor. I do not know if that young tenor would not flee away to early sounds again, if it should try to harmonize with the unmentionable tones of this voice, that to-day does not try its own melody.

To seek again for a lost voice! One wonders that among his acquisitions he cannot find the blessing whose face he did not recognize till it whispered "Good-by." But no moralizing, if you please.

PHILIP.

THE harvest of the grain growing counties of the State is giving an enormous yield this year. Some favored portions of the Bay counties have yielded nearly fifty bushels of wheat to the acre, and nearly double the amount of barley. The principal element of "golden" California's wealth may now be gold, but in future it will surely be her golden grain.

A TRIUMPH OF ART.—Chancing to visit recently the extensive Music and Piano establishment of Messrs. Wamelink & Barr, on St. Clair street, we took occasion to examine a Grand Scale Square Piano of Bradbury's build, which Messrs. W. & B. claim as the finest Piano ever brought to the West, and from what we then heard of its capabilities we feel justified in saying that we have never before heard an instrument possessing such rich roundness, mellowness, and depth of tone. It is not our purpose to vaunt its superiority over any other particular build of pianos, but merely to note its own excellence, with a feeling of gratification that the taste of our citizens is so refined as to create a demand for such instruments. This magnificent instrument possesses not one harsh, jarring or "wooden" note, either in its highest or lowest registers; it sinks its melodious tones to the softness of an æolian harp, or in the wildest forte passages pours forth a flood of richest harmony, its music seeming a thing of soul, and life and sympathy, with the heart of an impassioned performer, not a mere machine of hammers, wires, and keys, for the rendering of written notes. It seemed to us as if perfection had at length been reached in the construction of the piano-forte. This instrument has since been sold to a wealthy gentleman of Oil City, but Messrs. Wamelink & Barr propose to replace it by a similar one at an early day.—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

FASHIONABLE CLOTHING.—J. R. Mead & Co., corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, so justly celebrated for the superiority of the styles and finish of the clothing got up for them by their New York house, are now reducing their stock by selling at cost, to make room for Fall and Winter goods.

CLOSING OUT.—The stock of Clothing and Furnishing Goods of the estate of the late Thomas G. Sandford, is being sold out at 233 Montgomery street, to close up the business, by the Administrators. See advertisement.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,
HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,
With the most astonishing success in curing
Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of
The Throat, Lungs and Chest,
INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of
PULMONARY COMPLAINTS
has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both *SETH W. now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers through out the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

A NEW INVENTION!
LEWIS'S
Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

For particulars address DULL & GEORGE, San Francisco, or apply at Whitbeck's wagon factory, Market street above First. ap8-tf

IMPORTANT TO THE LADIES!
MRS. READ,
NO. 109 MONTGOMERY STREET,
(OVER FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE DEPOT,)
INVITES THE ATTENTION OF THE LADIES TO HER NEW IMPROVED
Skirt Supporters and Chest
EXPANDERS,
For Expanding the Chest, Strengthening the Lungs and Stomach, Curing the bad habit of Stooping, and Straightening Curvatures of the Spine.

This Supporter possesses more merit than perhaps any other invention, has received the unanimous approbation of those who have used them, and is actually invaluable to every lady wishing to possess
GRACE OF FORM
AND
SYMMETRY OF PERSON.
It is comfortable to the frame, and fits with a nicety never attained by any other invention.

MRS. READ also fits Supporters for HERNIA and RUPTURE, and furnishes an elegant article of
GENTLEMEN'S BRACES AND SUSPENDERS.

MRS. READ also has a beautiful style of BUST,
Indispensable in a Lady's Toilet.

MRS. READ also has a Supporter which she can confidently recommend to Ladies suffering from prolapsus uteri. It has no equal, and is far superior to the many mechanical supporters used in such cases, fitting the form perfectly. It is free from pads and steel, and creates no irritation; gives comfort and ease, with such an amount of support it would seem impossible to do without it.

Ladies, please call and examine for yourselves, or leave your orders, and Mrs Read will wait upon you at your residences.

Mrs. Read will be in attendance at her Reception Room from 8 to 11 A. M. and after 6 P. M. my27-tf

THE FIFTH INDUSTRIAL FAIR

OF THE

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE

OF SAN FRANCISCO,

TO BE HELD IN THE

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE PAVILION,

IN AUGUST, 1865.

The MECHANICS' INSTITUTE having determined to hold their Fifth Industrial Fair during the coming season, the Executive Committee would respectfully invite all persons desirous of exhibiting Machines, Manufactures, Agricultural Implements, Horticultural Products, Minerals, Ores and Works of Art, to make application immediately, in order that the proper space may be allotted them.

The Exhibition will be opened on THURSDAY, the 10th day of August, at 10 o'clock A. M.

The general management of the Fair is entrusted to an Executive Committee, consisting of the officers of the Institute.

No contracts or agreements will be recognized, unless made by the authorized agents of this committee.

A competent person will be in attendance at the Pavilion to receive and register all goods designed for exhibition, and will receipt therefor.

Contributions of machinery and other articles that require long time to prepare for exhibition, will be received from the 15th of July to the 21 of August.

Articles for exhibition that require large space may be entered on or before the 20th day of July, and space will be allotted to the exhibitor on or before the 21 of August.

The Picture Galleries will be ready for the reception of Pictures, Embroidery, Wax and Fancy Work of all kinds on the 1st of August, when space will be allotted.

The committee will be prepared for the reception of Fruits, Flowers, Agricultural and Horticultural productions, and design to have the tables so arranged that the best display possible can be made in this department; and every effort will be made and care taken to preserve their freshness, so that exhibitors may receive full credit for their productions. Those wishing space on these tables should engage it at an early day. There will be space reserved for additions to this department during the Fair.

The several transportation companies, as on former occasions, have, with commanding liberality, consented to transport articles intended exclusively for exhibition, free of charge, and Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co., in like manner, will take charge of them.

The committee have the fullest confidence that the coming Fair will not only be the most complete and varied in its character, but will also be more attractive than any previous Exhibition of the kind on this coast.

No pains or expense will be spared to give the contributors satisfactory opportunities in the spacious Pavilion of the Institute for the display of their contributions, and to furnish whatever may be necessary to make the Fair an institution where those who frequent it may be pleased and instructed.

All articles forwarded should be labelled, "For the Industrial Fair," San Francisco.

CAN MAN CRITICISE WOMAN'S DRESS?

WE hardly know whether it is to be taken as a tribute to the dignity, or as a snub to the self-conceit, of the male animal of the human species that he is so rarely consulted upon the outward adornment of his female companion; but when we call to mind the universal prevalence of this exclusion, it is impossible not to wonder at the inconsistency of the sex which has thus tabooed from masculine approach one chief subject of its thoughts. For what is the invariable auswer which a lady makes to any remonstrance that may be addressed to her upon the costliness or the inconvenience of her attire? Does she not always turn round upon you with the retort that men at least have no right to make such complaints, because it is simply to please men that womeu are so anxious to look well? Now, supposing this answer to be true, there follows from it a very obvious consequence. If it is for man's gratification and improvemcnt only that young ladies devote so much of their own time, their parents' money, and their dressmakers' skill to the settlement of the great question what they shall wear, they ought surely to feel some interest in discovering if they have succeeded in their benevolent design. It cannot be desirable or pleasant for them to remain in total ignorance whether all their disinterested exertions may not have been entirely thrown away. And yet if every male mouth is to be closed, and every male suggestiou rejected as superfluous or impertinent, there is no way left of obtaining this invaluable knowledge. We are most sensible of the honor which women do us when they profess to have no other object in dressing themselves than the wish to enchain our fascinated gaze by the beatified apparition of a fashionably got up augel; but, considering their repeated assertions to this effect, we should have more respect for their consistency if they did not so often resent as insulting the least approach to criticism. Indeed, even our admiration, however respectful or however delicate it may be, is frequently rejected unless at the same time it is absolutely dumb and unintelligent. It would almost seem as though, to be accepted by the objects to whom it is offered, it must be wanting in any intellectual basis whatever. A man may be allowed to admire, but he must never presume to express—it will be safer for him not even to have—an intelligible reason for his admiration. He may go so far, for example, as to speak of crinoline as a becoming fashion, or to say that a particular young lady looks better in a low dress than in a high one. But if, in the innocence of his heart, he praises the hoop-petticoat because it displays the ankles to advantage, or prefers the evening gown because it leaves visible a pair of white shoulders, the chances are that, though he has only put into words a fact of which the fair wearers of the garments in question are perfectly conscious, he will be held nevertheless to have committed an offence of the deepest dye. We know of no other consolation under these undeserved trials than the reflection that the charges of presumption and of meddling in things too high for them, which are so freely levelled at men who venture to have an opinion on such matters, are nothing after all but a reproduction of the common misconception to which criticism has always been exposed. It is always asumed that any qne who—not being a poet, a novelist, or a woman—dares so much as hint at any imperfection in the rhythm of a verse, the plot of a story, or the make of a gown, ought necessarily to be able to construct something better. People forget that the sphere of art is wide enough to give full play to the critical as well as to the creative faculty, and that the two are rarely found in combination. And so, though man could never unite into one mysterious whole the varying elements of color, form and texture which make up the feminine costume, he may still be able to test the process by ascertained principles of taste, and to pronounce, however diffidently, whether the result is in accordance with his standard.—Saturday Review.

The Little Gavroche.—Here is the last Parisian literary anecdote: "Receutly an elderly, but well preserved gentleman, while walking on the Place de l'Hotel de Ville, Brussels, was struck by the sign over a tobacco shop, 'Au Petite Gavroche.' Looking first on the sign, and then at the number of the house, he said to the friend who was with him: 'I really don't understand that. It certainly was here!' He entered, and speaking to an elderly lady, said: 'I beg your pardon, madam, but please tell me, have you tenanted this house long?" 'No, sir, I have heen here only two years.' 'May I ask you, without being over-inquisitive, why you took that sign?' 'Do you know M. Victor Hugo?' 'I do not, but I know little Gavroche, for I have read Les Miserables.' 'Did you like the book?' 'Indeed I did, for I, too, belong to this people. I have seen barricades, and have been in prison for political opinion's sake.' She weut on giving an ardent red republican creed of her own. When she euded, he held out his hand to her, saying: 'Madam, allow me to shake hands with you as a friend; I am the father of little Gavroche.' It was Victor Hugo. His astonishment on seeing his little hero's name on a sign was doubled by its hanging on the house in which he commenced writing Les Miserables.'" We are assured that is no convenient fiction, but a veritable fact.

BURSTING OF A WATERSPOUT ON A RAILWAY.

THE Liverpool Mercury says: "As the four o'clock express train from Edinburg to Glasgow was nearing Croy station, aud speeding along the line, which at this point is carried through a deep cutting, the engine-driver was signaled, when passing the 4:15 P. M. express train from Glasgow, to proceed cautiously. Shortly after the warning had been given, a fearful noise was heard; flashes of lightning gleamed through the hazy air, followed by quick crashes of thunder; the carriages of the train were at the same time assailed by what seemed to the affrighted passengers a terrific shower of hail, and in an instaut a perfect deluge of water came sweeping down from the shelving rocks on either side of the cutting. A waterspout had evideutly burst in the vicinity of the line, and before the speed of the train could be diminished to any considerable extent it shot right into the centre of the suddenly-released waters, which, foaming and seething, rushed into the cuttiug in solid sheets. The water gradually rose outside the carriages, reaching in a short time the footboard, and afterwards floating into the first-class compartments, while the hissing noise which was produced through contact with the works of the engine tended to increase the feeling of consternation aud alarm which already prevailed amongst the passengers. The difficulties of the situation were still further complicated by the sudden descent of a quautity of stonework from the heights above, arising probably from the giving way of a drystone fence, which, spreading across the rails, destroyed any hope that might have been entertained by the party of a passage being effected down the line after the water had cleared away. Meanwhile the train, its momentum imperfectly arrested, had been quietly gliding into the accumulated waters; and as the line here takes a slight decline, every inch of progress led into deeper danger, until it was finally brought to a stand. All this was the work of a few minutes. The passengers had been suddenly placed in a most critical position, and the safety in which they were enabled to ride it over—no persoual injuries having been sustained—was probably owing to the presence of mind of the engine-driver, who, when he saw the turn affairs were taking, at once fixed the damper over the furnace, thus preventiug the iugress of the water, aud avoiding the explosion that might otherwise have followed. The train was by-and-by backed out of the water; aud while it was evident that the journey to Glasgow must be for some time delayed, all positive danger was at an end. Some of the passengers quitted the carriages, aud, climbing up to the top of the cutting, walked down as far as Croy station. The waterspout had evidently beeu limited to a comparatively narrow area, within which, however, it had operated with terrible force, for on reaching Croy it was found that here the elemental strife had been even more alarming while it lasted. The water was flowiug into the station, and the number of wagons which where shunted into a kind of lye had been floated right out into an adjoining field. The telegraph wires along the line, it was also ascertained, had been destroyed, so that communication with Glasgow was cut off; but the station-master seut a man on horseback to Campsie junction, from which intelligence of the occurrence was trausmitted to the city. The obstruction to the liue was of such a nature as to cause a detention of four hours to the traiu.

Modern Overtasking.—Human life is, in many respects worth more now than it was a hundred years ago. We no longer, as a rule, eat and drink to excess, as our ancestors did; we do not invite apoplexy by covering our heads with a cap of dead hair, and swathing our throats in folds of unnecessary linen; our sanitary arrangements are a hundred fold better, and our town-dwellers see much more of the country, and taste much more of the country air. Yet it is certain that nervous disorders are greatly on the increase, and it is to be feared that the excitement of modern life is introducing new maladies while removing old. A physician of the early or middle Georgian era said that a large proportion of the deaths of Englishmen was due to repletion. The proportion under that head is uow very much less; but what we have gained in one direction we have lost in another. Among the intellectual and mercantile classes of the presént day, the greatest danger to life is from nervous exhaustion. We make too serious and too incessant demands on the most delicate part of our structure, and the whole fabric gives way under paralysis, or heart complaint, or softening of the brain, or imbecility, or madness. Disease of the heart is constantly sweeping off our men of intellect, and the vast size of our modern lunatic asylums, together with the frequent necessity of adding to their number, is a melancholy proof of the over-wrought state of a large part of the population.

A Fine Retort.—On the day of the President's funeral a bronzed and weather-beaten soldier, anxious to obtain a better view of the procession, happened to step before a party of ladies and geutlemen. One of the gentlemen nudged him on the elbow, at the same time observing: "Excuse me, sir, you are right in front of us." Bowing handsomely in return, the soldier replied: "That is nothing remarkable for me, sir; I have been in front of you for four years."

WHAT MAKES BEAUTY IN A FRENCH WOMAN.

NEVER has any civilization flowered into such a womanhood as that of France. How intelligent, how bright, sympathetic, inspiring, deadly! There alone you find mouths that are, at the same time, gates for oracles and pillows for kisses. A good and noble Frenchwoman is the rose of all the world. We were looking at a head of such an one, at Goupil's, the other day. It was by Edouard Dubufe, Dubufe fils, the mau who can ask what price he likes for his portraits in Paris. Dubufe himself, a snug, boyish fellow in patent leathers, can get his palette and his curly head into the most exclusive bouidoirs of France—and be splendidly rewarded for the intrusion.

A picture from Europe, painted with perfect art, is a national event. Dubufe paints heads and hauds with such perfection and intensity that, to look at his work, you would think he could paint but those extremities alone, like the Russian musicians who could only blow one note apiece, and blow that one like Orpheus. The great artist distinguishes himself by grappling boldly with what lesser men consider the prosaic part of their work, and translating it into beauty. Canova—a fourth-rate man—was afraid of the skeleton, and represented his pretty dolls as boneless. Dubufe, in this head, has clearly indicated the cheek-bones, and a rather sharp chin—and they seem necessities of loveliness. It is a brunette, with quiet, planet eyes, clouded hair, "like twilight," as Wordsworth says, aud the hair seems to have been swept away from the perfect temples by a storm of kisses. The mouth is of the texture and color of rose-leaves, humid velvet; along the upper lip hangs the just guessable cloud of that slight moustache which goes with the pure brunette complexion, while near one corner, distracting, provoking, bewitching, sits the beauty-spot, the tyrannical, fantastic mole.

The hands of Dubufe's women are almost terrible; lithe and wise as serpents, large, and with the signs of physical strength clotted up in cream, they repose or undulate along a surface like separate creatures, living in their own wills, and ready to wake and peep from under their pink nails. We had never imagined such hands until we saw the pictures; we had rather know one such hand than many a whole woman we wot of. "Her steady eyes," says Currier Bell, somewhere, "I cannot picture. They are clear, they are deep as lakes, they are lifted and full of worship, they tremble with the rapture of love and the softness of prayer." That will do if you leave out the 'prayer;' that Gothic faculty has been denied to these purely French creations.

But are there really such women in France? Why, a man will find himself pantiug and panting, and ready to cry before the mere painted simulacra. Who can stand in the day of the live woman of France?—Frank Leslie.

Advertising in Olden Times.—Macadamized roads, in all save the name, were known iu the Roman dominions 200 years before the Christian era, and were not merely limited to the vicimty of the capital, but were laid down in every province that succumbed to the valor of the republican arms. At an equally early age, the Roman Senate, among various other decrees relating to the order and discipliue to be observed in the city, enacted that men should give place to women in the streets, and leave them the unrestricted use of the smooth line of pavement, which every house-owner had to maiutain in good condition in front of his own residence. Colossal sign-boards announced to the passers-by the business followed in the houses; while in the times of Plautus, notices of lost aud found objects were displayed on placards written in letters a cubit long; and gladiatorial games, races, shows and theatrical exhibitions were made public by huge boards displaying colored representations of some of the most striking scenes or sights to be exhibited. The walls, doors and palings were covered with these rude advertisements, which seem generally to have been drawn in some bright cotor on a black or red ground. Although the Romans, like other ancient nations, were ignoraut of printing as applied to the multiplication of books, they were familiar with the use of printing types, which their potters used for stamping names on their vases; and we are told that the Emperor Justinian, wheu he wished to append his signature to a public document, had recourse to a small wooden tablet, on which the letters of his name were cut, which he traced on the paper by following with the point of his style or pen the various contours of the carving. But perhaps the straugest indication that most of our assumed discoveries and inuovations are mere réhabilitations, to use a French word, of pre-existiug things, is supplied by the suggestion which is ascribed to Plato for "the establishment of agencies for marriage, by means of which the qualities of each candidate for matrimony might be made known, and men thus have a better chance of securing wives suited to their various characters." The idea seems to have been lost for ages, but not wholly, for it revived in great force about a ceutury ago, when some ingenious German, either from the depth of his own consciousness, or from a careful study of Plato's writings, established at Hamburg an office for the transaction of matrimonial affairs, in which advertisements for husbands and wives were always to be seen. There was not the slightest mystery or reserve assumed; and there is great frankness displayed both by the ladies and gentlemen who took part in these negotiations, for we are informed by one advertiser that "she is fifty-nine years of age, and having buried her fourth husband within the previous three weeks, is anxious to meet with a good-looking healthy young man of twenty-six, as successor to her lamented partners. He need be uuder no trouble or care about money matters, as she has plenty of both, and will leave him as her universal legatee."

RARE CHANCE
TO SECURE
DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III, Scene 2.

WE answered "Subscriber, G. & L.'s" query about "monkey on the heart" last week—the consequences have been terrible. Could we have anticipated them, we should have shrunk from the task in terror. Our vanity has been the ruin of us. The thousands of readers of THE CALIFORNIAN have come to the conclusion that the man who could solve such a problem as that propounded by "Subscriber, G. & L.," is capable of answering any question. The occupation of the editor of the Sunday Mercury is gone. He may now cry: "Farewell 'Constant Subscriber,' farewell 'Mud Springs;' farewell 'Traveller' and all ye tribe of anxious enquirers who want to know, and give me an opportunity to display my wisdom; the "Mouse-Trap" man has done my business; 'monkey on the heart' will be the death of me." We didn't mean to do it, but we have. We don't believe the editor of the Mercury has received one solitary enquiry this week. He can't have done so. Everybody can't want to know, you know; and all those who do, have sent their queries to the "Mouse-Trap." Their number is appalling; a boy has to be kept in constant attendance on the letter-box to empty it of its contents to make room for more. We will answer a few of those which appear to be the most urgent, just by way of a beginning, and to prove we are in earnest and intend to answer all in course of time:

A SWELL.—We cannot inform you whether paper collars are numbered according to size, but we know the paper of which they are made is all sized.

BOB.—We decline to inform you how much a pawnbroker would probably be willing to lend on your sister's waterfall. We do not believe you could put a waterfall up the spout, and if you could it would be wrong to do so.

LATIN SCHOLAR.—No, "Mea voluntas sum currit suum caput contra homo dic pax plenum sed," is not classical Latin. The literal translation of it, is "My William runs his head against the mantelpiece full butt."

POLITICIAN.—Absalom was a "long hair;" but we would not advise you to rely too much on this Scriptural fact, as it is well known that Samson was of no account whatever when he became a "short hair."

JULIA.—Tell you what your name signifies? Certainly. It was first given to an Israelitish lady who was an admirable performer on the Hebrew lyre or Jews-harp. Jew-lyre in course of time became corrupted into Julia.

CONFUCIUS.—We cannot say whether or no the editor of the Call has personal reasons for disliking the Chinese. We are inclined to believe that the story, that it is owing to a disappointment in love, he having been refused by a beautiful damsel of the Flowery Kingdom, to whom he offered his hand and heart, is a fabrication. The reason he had such a bad attack yesterday, may have been the omission of the Chinese merchants to invite him to their dinner party. We understand that, if the Chinese are unpopular with the Call, the Call is equally unpopular among the Chinese, it being too small to envelope a clean shirt. They say "Alta likee, good paper, Alta; Call no likee; too littee."

MUSICUS.—The great musical authority of this city is a gentleman connected with the Alta; he is a fine Italian scholar, as may be seen by referring to the Alta of Monday, August 14th, where, under the head of "Musical Matters," he gives the names of artists engaged by Muretzek for the Academy of Music. He obtained this information from a certain literary paper published in New York. Had the names been published in English instead of Italian, Monday's edition of the Alta would have been seized by the police. He is also an accomplished French scholar, and translates plays from that language into English. That he is thoroughly conversant with French, is sufficiently proved by his speaking of the church of "Notre Dame des Victoires" as "Notre Dame des Victories," in the same article in which he displays his knowledge of Italian. It is not every paper in San Francisco that can afford to secure the services of so accomplished a scholar and musical critic as this gentleman, but the proprietors of the Alta are wealthy. "If "Musicus" will read his Alta attentively, he cannot fail to be well posted on musical matters; that paper is to San Francisco what Dwight's Journal of Music is to Boston, only a little more so.

WE delight in Gottschalk's fantasies; we adore his murmures Æoliennes; but why will he not wed some of his delicious music to verse, and thus render that verse immortal. He could find many sweet little things in the Flag—we were going to say in the Poets' Corner of the Alta, but alas, that is still walled up! that blank commercial column still runs up to the top of the page. Why is the door of that sweet temple of the muses cruelly shut up? We hope the Alta will relent, and we shall soon have an opportunity of devoting a column to the reopening of the Poets' Corner. Perhaps the "stately march of numbers" which characterizes the poetry of the Flag is not suited to Gottschalk's music. Gottschalk's music is so simple. Something innocent would suit him. Poetry is not our forte, but we modestly lay the following simple little thing on the pedal of the great composer's magnificent Chickering as a bumble tribute to his genius, hoping that he may deem it not unworthy to be set to music. We have endeavored to catch the spirit of many of the great composers' most admired works, and at the same time have partly adopted the idea of the sweetly pathetic cradle songs sung by the peasantry of the Alpine valleys. We shall be indeed flattered if Mr. Gottschalk will set our lines to music, and shall consider we are amply repaid for the hours of anxious thought consumed in their composition:

Chickering-a-ring-a-ring,
Chickering-a-ri-do,
Chickering's pianos sing—
Play on them as I do.

Chick-chick Chickering,
Hear the sweet sounds swelling,
Golden music thence I bring,
Thousands they are selling.

Chick-a-ring-a Chick-a-Chick
Sounds like rippling water,
O'er the keys fly fingers quick—
Chickering's a snorter.

My soul's in my Chickering,
Chickering a-ring-ing;
Now I laugh, and now I sing,
Each note dollars bringing.

You can do it well as I,
Chickering-a-ri-do,
Orders left, attended to—
Chickerings supplied, oh!

THE following extraordinary announcement appeared in the Examiner of Tuesday last:

"ASCENSION DAY.—To-day, throughout France as well as all other Catholic countries, is observed as one of heavenly rejoicing."

We are afraid that Localitems of the Examiner is a sad heathen, or he would certainly be aware that Ascension occurs on the third day after Good Friday, which this year fell on the 14th of April. Tuesday last was celebrated by the Catholic church throughout the world as the feast of the Immaculate Conception, and by Frenchmen as the fête day of Napolean. Localitems of the Examiner will please make a note of the fact that Ascension Day cannot occur as late in the year as th 15th of August.

"MAHLSTICK" writes a letter to the Alta, praising the pictures exhibited in the Fair, by Fortunato Arriola. Fortunate, oh Arriola, art thou to have such an advocate as "Mahlstick"! This exuberant youth—his letter proves him to be a youth—gushes with ecstatic praise of "a sweet little picture, depicting an angel in the act of hearing a beautiful infant to the spirit regions." This is indeed a remarkable picture. The thought that strikes one on looking at that child is, Can the angel carry it much farther? It is a perfect baby Bunting. The little monster looks as if it had died of apoplexy!

WE notice a piece of music has been published called "The Last Ditch Polka." Many bloody-minded radicals would like to make "The Last Ditch Polka" a dance on nothing for the leaders of the rebellion.

WE want a musical composer. We were reminded of this went when we saw the last act of Romeo and Juliet at the Academy of Music last night, and listened to the music to which "Romeo" died. The music to which people die from the effects of poison in operas has a dreadful sameness. The composers do not study their subject sufficiently. They should first ascertain the nature of the poison which causes the death which they are to set to music. If laudanum has been taken, then the music may be soft, sleepy, and soothing; but how different should it be when strychnine is the drug employed! Then it should be sharp, fierce and spasmodic. Let composers, like doctors, try experiments with different poisons on animals, mark their effects and compose their music accordingly. A startling effect could be introduced into one of these poisioning scenes, thus: The victim is about to expire; strychnine music is agonizing the audience; in rushes a doctor with a stomach-pump and pumps him out to stomach-pump-music. We are sure it could be done; and if Mr. George T. Evans will undertake to compose an opera, introducing this startlingly original effect, we shall be happy to write the libretto, and assist him in strychnining a few cats, from whose dying agonies he can take musical notes, and, the heavenly muse assisting, we three could produce something great. While on the subject of medicine in connection with opera, we may mention that the proprietor of a patent medicine has offered Mr. Maguire $1,000 for the privilege of being allowed, this afternoon, when Traviata is to be performed at the Academy, to rush on the stage just before "Violetta" dies, and save her life by administering a bottle of his wonderful syrup. "Alfredo" is then to exclaim, "Saved! saved!" "Il Dottore" will answer, "Consumption is curable," and the patent medicine man, holding up the bottle, will add, "Yes, with Snufflem's Syrup;" and the curtain will fall. This would, no doubt, be a much more pleasing denouement, and the change in the opera necessitated by its adoption would be slight; but Mr. Maguire objects and will not even allow Professor Snufflem to distribute three thousand copies of his pamphlet entitled "Consumption Curable" in the dress circle. Violetta will, therefore, die this afternoon as usual to consumptive music, but the public as they listen to that distressing cough in the second act will be kind enough to remember that one bottle of Snufflem's syrup would, in the early stages of the disease, check it and save Violetta's life.

WE took occasion a week or two ago to refer to the ridiculous lines inserted to make out the full measure of a column. Here is one which appears in a number of papers: "Short rents make long friends." Now what does that mean? We should not expect to remain friends with our landlady long if we were in the habit of paying her rent short. Does it mean that by renting a house for a short time, and then moving, you have not time to quarrel with the owner? Bah! It is perfect nonsense. "Long rents make long friends," would appear to have some sense in it, but the other statement is absurd.

THE editor of the Reese River Reveille says he has been shown a letter from a person in Montana that contains "a laughter-provoking incident." A man went out to shoot moose, didn't know what a moose was like, met a drove of camels and shot one for a moose. We honor the editor of the Reveille for not, instead of calling it "a laughter-provoking incident," heading this paragraph "A-moosing occurrence," and afterwards saying that the man who shot the camel though he didn't shoot a deer, had a dear shot.

How true is it that, when everything appears prosperous, one is often brought to realize the weakness of human hopes by a thorn in one's side. "Inigo," on the first night of his comedy, had a thorne in his side which sadly rent the web which his fancy had woven, of tumultuous calls for the author, showers of bouquets, etc. There is no rose without a thorn. "Inigo" could not even say that the curtain rose without a thorne.

HENRY WARD BEECHER calls Secretary Stanton the most lion-like man of our times. The Flag, referring to this, says:

"Stanton is more like a hulldog, holding on with the tenacity of that animal."

We think Beecher knew what he was about when he used the term lion. A good many people thought when Stanton was in the dispatch-manufacturing business that very often he was a lyin'-like thunder.

A HYPERCRITICAL individual says that silver ore cannot be called raw material after it is roasted; there is quite a difference between silver ore and silver roasted.

ELDER R. GRAHAM preaches the gospel every Tuesday and Thursday night at Dashaway Hall. The gospel is called the bread of life; in this case it is of course Graham bread.

EFFORTS are being made by numerous parties of explorers to prove that California is an ile-land.

TREM.

MY SECOND CAPTURE.

A NIGHT IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHENANDOAH.

THE Adjutant T—— and myself, not inexperienced in battles, though, perhaps, like most Americans, infants in warfare, were captured in September last, in the Valley of the Shenandoah, Nature's noble art-gallery, on the west side of Opequan Creek, a stream that is a picture at almost any point. In one of the gallant charges which our eager cavalry, under General Sheridan, made before the great charge that captured Winchester and the Valley, our regiment had the right, and gained a fine position in the end. But two or three encounters were very close. The sea of battle surged back and forth, tormented only, however, by the mild breezes of a day like May; and as the waves of our army withdrew from the ridge on which the enemy rested, to gain greater impetus, my poor horse was shot under me, stranded, and left rolling upon the ground, midway between friend and foe. The orderly, my attendant, had another in the rear of the retreating column; but, inasmuch as that was now swept by the swift-receding current far beyond us, he could neither have me mounted nor command other present means whereby to get me off. I reclined, like Adonis, upon a soft bed of meadow-grass studded here and there with wild-flowers, an emerald velvet with silver spangles—but suffering, unlike him, from bruises, and with my best soulless friend dead at my side. I was somewhat sprained by the fall the dying beast had given me. The enemy was close at hand, following with yells and chaotic eagerness upon our troops.

"We'll take a march to Libby," said my orderly, dropping on his knees to feel my bones.

He drew his arm through his rein, (having had no idea of deserting me in his sound health by the aid of his ready animal) and continued his examination; whilst his sturdy favorite chopped the short grass within reach of his breathing hitching-post as closely as his long bit would allow. In a very few moments the Rebel foam was surging like wild beyond us—a private pausing at me for a second, to poke me in the ribs with his piece.

"There's life there, Grayback," growled my attendant; and the Rebel ordered us to the rear.

Indeed, had we remained where we were, we would soon have been in the rear, so impetuously did the foe sweep by us. But private soldiers, the potent keystones of the Rebel arch, built to crush the voice of the many, command the Southern armies in every great engagement; and one of these important atoms had given us our hint to move. You never see anything but the rank and file in the heart of a Rebel corps. Our new commander mounted my orderly's horse, and soon was lost in the distance.

It is not, I have found, a very diverting entertainment to wander free a few moments (a free prisoner) in search of some authority, out of the myriads who have the opportunity, who shall choose to take charge of one. I felt peculiarly as I stood irresolute, now framing one thought, now another, casting about in my mind, weighing the odds with no light fancy-scales, which of the rushing demons on all sides would draw up before me with a curse, and command me to follow him. Our regiment, our corps, our whole army, (this last had not left its works for the little fight,) were far in the distance now; and the ground on which I stood, and which but a short time since was tramped by Northern troops, had, in the mutations of war, become a portion of the Rebel dominions. The September sun shone brightly through the white fleece of the cloud-swans swimming in the morning air; and the early spring breeze that I have mentioned—for Æolus had given freedom to but a tender dove-zephyr—played with the silk fringe of the meadow grass, finding no olive-branch here, venturing its ripple, with the audacity of innocence, under the very heels of the contending forces. Possibly the feeling of loneliness which overwhelms a man at such a time as this is the most acute of all his feelings. I looked my orderly in the face as he supported me on his shoulder. He was gazing coolly before him.

"If we have to march soon, you had better rest," he said, deliberately. "There's a tree you can sit under. And if you have money or a watch, you had better hide them in your armpits."

We went to the tree, and set ourselves against it.

The fresh air that brushed by us, like fine steel points, relieved me of my oozing faintness, and in the ease of my circumstances I could attend somewhat to my bruises. With the aid of my canteen, I relaxed the strained muscles. It was my desire to have my loins girt about and my limbs in good order for the foot-journey that I doubted not was before us. They would march us to Gordonsville, and thence to Libby, carrying us through in an incredibly short time, and without boots at that. I had two objects to labor for, as I began to get myself into condition: first, to be taken in charge by an officer; and then—to escape from him that night, whilst the train was in disorder. I was of opinion that my companion, a taciturn machine, who labored, like the miners, well with his little light, had some such plan of his own, as I saw him buckling his belt beneath his trousers. He was stowing away his watch and a photograph—which every soldier must have, of some poor maid or other who toils in the shades of obscurity at home—and making himself ready for a run at any favorable moment. I thought that I would sound him.

"You had better do it, orderly, soon in the day," I said: "since the enemy will march you between two files, and you will then have but little chance."

"So I think," he replied. "I thought no time better than now. But then——"

"But what?" I asked.

"Well, it's rather hard to leave you here. What with your sprain, and your blow on the head, you're pretty sure to halt at Libby."

I had no chance to answer, for the Rebel was before me who was to have the honor of my capture.

He was of the flabby white flesh species of the genus Rebel, a Quaker scarecrow with matty locks, that many of my brethren in arms have met; harmless in units, but ponderous as even scarecrows will be, if hurled back and forth in thousands, swarms; lank, cadaverous, and whining; snuff-chewing, and grossly filthy, even under the best of circumstances. His flesh was set dough, and his hair was long and yellow. He spoke through the dirty causeway of his nose. The road-dust and drab of his uniform, so called in satire, have often been described. These gentlemen's faces, to me, who incline to an intelligent expression on the human index, look like tallow-vats of nursery-suet, pliable and swill-fed; and their mien and carriage have never impressed me favorably. I had seen them rush with a wild yell, an army like the Paris mob of intoxicated rags, upon our Gibraltar at Gettysburg; and had myself charged upon their Attila-works (behind which they had their household gods piled up and ready for burning) at Fredericksburg. I had even taken a ball from one of them in the shoulder, whilst skirmishing, in the shiftings of my experience; and they had before had the honor of my capture, in sunny, grape-growing Maryland. Perhaps all these scenes passed in panorama before my mind's eye, as I rose to my captor and eyed his dirty linen. Here was an indignity, indeed. My soul revolted at the thought of a journey southward, and all my instincts warned me against so dire an undertaking. I stood before the Rebel with my determination in my eye.

"A couple of Yanks, lolling under a tree," he screamed to his companions, pointing the finger, and garnishing his speech, in Rebel manner, with an oath. "P'rhaps you thought you were off," he chuckled.

He was "goin'" to take us to the "Gen'ral." He muttered more oaths with his orders, and directed us to be "right smart," and to "git."

I glanced at my orderly, who was inaugurating an onset upon the weaker side of this mean battery, or ditch-work—and who evidently counted upon making a breach by rapid, electric charges—by handing over his pistol. It was freely offered, before demanded, and the recipient took it in silence. He then drew out his tobacco, a treasure with which, I well knew, he would not willingly part, and which was the little ewe-lamb of his unjewelled life—which, also, was taken quickly, but under a nod of acknowledgements from the Rebel. The battery was shaken, but, in truth, continued to draw fire. "Give me your boots," said the critical captor, and the orderly knocked off his leathers in the best good-humor in the world. When we had walked a little farther, the orderly, now marching as the Moslems do on holy ground, asked our guide if he had any grub about him; and accepted a piece of pork. There was a variety of viands in the haversack from which this fragment came—both pork and bacon—but the fire-eaters, I have noticed, always prefer the latter meat. I divined at once that my orderly was laying in stores for a solitary tramp, and making a raven in this, to him, strange dessert, of the ill-omened bird that had pounced upon us. He would conciliate his enemy, and when the latter was growing careless, he would spring into some woods. The pork, with the berries to be found there, would sustain him after he had broken leash—and would be all that he would eat, no doubt, in the course of two or three suns.

We noticed a great stir on all sides of us, converging streams of straggglers, wounded men, and prisoners, as we made our way, scattering grasshoppers, over the fields, and soon mingled with the throng of troops on the open road to Winchester. It was about three miles from this town that our capture had taken place; and from the immense wagon-trains rumbling along with us, and the excited manner of the officers, I augured not as well for the Rebel cause. Perhaps Fortune had altered her humor, and the white eagles of victory had settled with the opposite side. Other parties of Union prisoners journeyed with us, and through the urgent manner of their guards, I thought I could discern a sunlit loop-hole to Freedom. In five minutes' time I was assured that the Rebels were preparing to retreat. Their six-horse teams were rushing to the rear, and their outlying bodies of cavalry were being hurriedly dispatched the other way. My mind was very busy on the new aspect of affairs.

The last I saw of my orderly was when he divested himself of the workman's incumbrance—his coat—and was trumping, bootless, haltingly along in the dustiest part of the road. He had conciliated his watchman into almost indifference, and was spreading himself with the sand, (tossed knee-high in little clouds by his feet,) having then become quite a Rebel in looks. In five minutes I turned upon him; but he had fallen out of the squad. I have never seen him since.

My own plans would keep me in the Rebel lines some hours longer. It was my object to escape; but I had already decided upon the evening, when darkness, and, I hoped, rain, would settle down upon us. I indulged a hasty prayer in behalf of the vanished man, and durst not more than snatch a look at where he should have been, lest the guard should miss him also. At one mile beyond Winchester, which town we had avoided by a branching road, we came to the office of the provost marshal, a very humble shell-work; and those of us who wore shoulder-straps were hustled into his presence.

He stood, the central figure in a dun picture, in an atmosphere of smoke, a dirty-looking Georgian in flying coat and high-boots. With hands in pocket he surveyed the objects brought before him, concisely delivering his orders over the stem of his teeth-clasped pipe. His clerk was at a table near, on which lay the papers of his office; and the splintered rafters behind him made the back-ground to a cabinet-picture that should have been done in chocolate.

We were placed in charge of a rather mild-looking officer, who wore his rank upon his sleeve in so elegantly twisted a knot that I could not make out his degree, and who had on a brand-new riding jacket, of a dark blue, to which the sleeve was attached, adorned with the staff-buttons of our army. It was his duty to command the guard that drove the captives of the Rebel hosts, in which safe branch of the service, as I afterwards learned, he had been engaged since '62. No doubt his many opportunities for demanding what he wanted, and for seizing, like Ahab, what was denied him, had furnished alike the jacket and the buttons; and were it not for his placid countenance, I should have fathered his entire outfit upon the Yankees—as having fallen to his shoulders by the same easy process. He was directed to drive us to the road at once, and to keep his herd in motion all the time. Hurried orders had come from headquarters, that set all the small bees about this lesser hive in a whirl of confused labors, whereby our departure was delayed for some moments. The provost marshal's clerk was even then packing up his rattling desk, pigeon-holing papers that would hatch knotty questions in the coop, and making due preparations for the departure of the Georgian magnate himself. I observed that their army-wagons kept trailing southward, like chalk vertebræ, in an unbroken string, and promised for a long while yet to obstruct the road. It was growing a little cloudy, too. It was now three hours after noon, and I hoped nervously for a sullen night.

Just before we set out on our melancholy march, I saw a man make a move toward me, and hastily clap one finger across his firm lips. It was Adjutant T——, of whom I have spoken, and who did not wish me to recognize him. It was his object to approach me, and to walk as a stranger at my side, so that the guards should not part us—and, I knew at once, to speak of a project common to both. The old stories of our camp-fires had flitted across his mind, and had blanched his cheek since morning. His blood was just thawing as he signalled me. I took no notice of him till after we had started, a company of men with bent brows, and he had marched on my right some forty rods. I then muttered slowly, "Speak little, and to the point;" whereat he waved his hand. It was singular and sad to ignore thus an old companion in the very hour of need, when surely a bitterness hung upon our souls that more than ever required balm. We were, perforce, to play the stranger, when at no time in life did we more thirst for the tender friend. Doubtless, our hopes of escape depended much upon each other; and we could but communicate those plans in insufficient monosyllables, which, if misunderstood, would lead to disaster. If ever plentiful words, in great ear-measures, are pardonable, it is at such moments as this—when even half-words—diamonds flashing betrayal—are imprudent. The Adjutant edged a little closer.

"Before dark, or after?" he asked.

To which I replied:

"After."

He gradually glided away from me, and for some time marched at the other side of the column.

I had noticed that he was walking without his jacket. The guards were accosting the officers in their neighborhood, and had taken his among other vestments. Most of the party of sad victims were well peeled ere their melancholy was an hour older. A rough boor turned to me and demanded my gauntlets. A basilisk fire shone through his eyes, and the breath which he blew through the grating of his teeth, over his thin, livid lips, and into my face, was freighted heavily with fumes of whisky. When I made bold to refuse him, he was dumbfounded in astonishment, and was pleased to compress his jaws.

"You d—d Yankee!" he screamed, profanely red with the inspiration of anger, "if you don't give me your gauntlets. I'll tear your hands from your body."

There was enough energy in his action to have guarantied even a more vehement manœuvre; and as he made his threat he raised his arm above me. But I had a mind to see myself through the affair in the course that I had chosen: and having noticed our mild officer a few paces in the rear of us, mounted upon his horse, and placidly sitting with his hand upon the pommel. I turned to him at once.

"If you will do me the favor, sir," I said, with some gravity of manner "I would like you to accept my gauntlets—a new pair from the box, that has only seen this day's work."

"They've had an unlucky birthday," he said, not inaptly, and rather courteously, as he took them.

"Yes, my gloves heretofore have all been spoiled by the sabre," I replied, keeping step with his charger. "I don't know but that you have to thank a drunken guard for the pair, sir, since he threatened to kill me, if I kept them on my hands."

He gave a hasty look for his orderly.

"Point out the man, if you can, sir," he said to me, and beckoned a trooper to his side.

"I am obliged to you for your interference," I answered. "The man marches third on the left there, and has his piece slung behind him. I hope that some day, sir, I may do you a favor."

A sense of humor, for which I must be grateful, considering the sombre dejection of my marching mate, filled my breast as I thanked him for his courtesy in putting one under guard for attempting (drunk) what he himself so soberly accomplished—the capture of my buckskins. He kept the gauntlets very willingly, and ordered a sergeant to accompany me. But there was generosity and magnificence in his action; the acquisition, per duress, of others' property was a daily habit with him—and to have a sergeant for a guard was a considerable favor. It was my desire to cultivate the sergeant thus cast within my reach, who otherwise might be a marlot, and who had good of some sort in him, I judged from his appearance; although, as with his kind, it was evidently very barren winter in his purse, and his summer clothes were apparently too open. His butternut jacket, a poor tweed with a cotton filling, was clasped about his throat with a shred of twine, flying away thence loosely, showing a dirty cotton shirt beneath, and the rough edge of the waistband of his pantaloons. The material of which these last were made was a very impressible jean, and marked the number of his journeys, could one but decipher them, in stains and intricate creases. He had the same face of lifeless suet, and the yellow hair that I have noticed as very prevalent in the rebel armies—but, withal, an elasticity of carriage that seemed too honest for the cause, an almost openness of countence, a cast of features tending towards amiability, which imbued me with a trembling hope. I had designs upon the sergeant, and intended opening upon him with rhetoric, after, perhaps, some amicable skirmishing. His detail to guard my person was a compliment to me which only the initiated—those who have made the same journey—can appreciate. The young provost officer with the sleeve-knots desired to offer me a delicate attention in return for my hand-furniture, and, perhaps, to impress me in some sort with his sense of right, even though he was of so wrong-headed a company. What a dainty, dew-sipping bunch of violets would be to conscious beauty—what a quaint volume of old matter, dust-breeding and crumbling, would be to the blinking scholar—what refined gold, or gold ore, or gold stamped in the mint, would be to a Wall street street broker—was this sergeant to myself. He was the gift of a royal potentate who stood not upon little matters. There was no calculation in the largess. I was to have the entire sergeant as all my own. We fell a rod behind the officer, and trudged evenly along.

Although big with an evil design, I did not intend to address my companion at once. The monotony of my walk, as I had at present nought else to think of, I allowed to engage a number of my thoughts. I hazarded conjectures upon many idle points, as my narrative will show. I fell to watching my feet, and to placing them, as far as practicable, directly in the footmarks of him who marched before me, instituting a sort of comparison between our soles, finding his smaller than mine, as, behind his back, I ventured upon his measure. I watched the ruts in the road, made by the wagons in advance of us, and wondered if those behind us had axle-trees as wide to an inch—as they would have, if made by the same contractor—in which case, I mused, it is just possible the coming train may move in this same rut. It seemed, then, a comfortable sort of a place. I saw the clouds of dust that had been provoked into rising in anger and rolling away sullenly many a day that weary summer, and that almost buried the wretched company in which we journeyed, hover heavily above the road-side, and choke the pretty weeds blooming there, by way of a mean revenge upon its human tormentors. Thereupon I envied the blue things, not their incubus, but their insignificance; for neither artillery, nor camp wagon, nor passing prisoner was aught to them. I wondered what each man here would say, if each man could tell his thoughts. Primarily, I was convinced, each captive would declare himself sick at heart; that is the only expression which will convey the sinking feeling. Once I heard a bird sing gayly a clear-throated song from a clump of trees; at which my heart grew sick also, to render me as miserable as the rest.

My mind reverted to Adjutant T——, of the manner of whose capture I knew nothing, and whom I had left that morning in camp, as the regiment set out for the fight. I doubted not but that he would be with me in a moment, to throw another mild projectile, a half-sentence at me. I had myself a catechism of one question with which to greet him. As some little parley might be necessary between us, which could not go on without the consent of our guardian, I concluded that then was the time to throw a sop to my sergeant. I turned coolly upon him.

"We are marching rather briskly, are we not, sergeant?" I said, endeavoring to insinuate the independence of unconcern in my bearing.

"Wal, right smart," he replied.

"I cannot tell by your uniform," I continued, with a half-smile, for the fellow was all beggar's rags and patches, "whether you are in the cavalry or not; but a pair of spurs, at any rate, may not come amiss to you—and I can have no use for mine for some time yet. They don't allow us, I believe, to kick one another in Libby?"

I took my long spurs from my boots, like fringe from my heart-strings, (of which the officer had directed my sergeant to allow no one to deprive me—the boots, not the heart-strings, they being inaccessible; I would possibly not lose those till I arrived in Richmond,) and handed them over to him.

"I'm of the Thirteenth Virginia Infantry," he said. "but do right smart duty on horseback," (he liked the steel.) "I'm detailed to the provost marshal. They do treat a fellow rather hard down there."

I augured ever so much good from the sergeant's "do," upon which there was an emphasis.

"Were you ever a prisoner, sergeant?" I asked, always careful to bestow his title.

"Once," he said, laconically.

"Well! it 's all one in the end," I said, carelessly turning from him, to show that I had no desire for the conversation, if he did not relish it. "You have a chance now to give me the devil of a time, in revenge for your treatment among my friends. 'T is an ill wind that blows nobody good."

My sang-froid had the savor of a good pickle. It was a very peculiar turn to give the affair, I must own: but I saw that the sergeant was struck by it. Possibly, that one was my best stroke of the day. I have, at any rate, ever since deemed it so.

I walked along as before, speculating, not lightly, upon the dejected beings about me, who marched, spectre-fashion, in the dust, like the unhappy (would-be) crew on the shores of the Styx, trying to appease Charon. They never would be at rest till he ferried them over to the shades of the world of death—or (what to them seemed impossible) till they were remanded back to life among the loved ones of their race. I remember particularly one trifle of this momentous march, that threatened towards night to gnaw into my very brain-tissues. Soldiers, it is known, are not over-careful in their dress, when in daily action in the field, nor have they time to grow fastidious during the fighting summer months. They then, perforce, disregard tapes with a loftier indifference to appearances than that which distinguishes the noble cynic of the world. But officers generally use tapes about their ankles (perhaps to keep some garment in place immediately upon the stocking:) and I have known them myself, for prudence' sake, to tie them in hard knots. A poor limping lieutenant, a little to the left, and some ten feet in advance of me, had not adopted this precaution, and now, consequently, more as a punishment to me than to him, one of his nursery ties had come undone, and was trailing after his foot in shadow-like persistency. I had here a world of torture in a nutshell. When, unluckily, my eyes fastened upon this appendage, I could not keep them from it. It fascinated me with more than the juggler's success upon the serpent. I fell to conjecturing how long the affair might be—if four inches or five; and pondered the allowance to be made in the calculation by reason of the man's distance; merging this view of the matter in another, as I watched his heel touch the ground, and noted the time which elapsed between that and the jumping forward of the foot, with the string, ever faithful, behind it. I conjectured how much dust the tape took up at each step, and wondered, if, in a long march, merely by accretion thereof, the end of it would not be a sort of dirt-coil, perhaps a tenth of an inch in diameter—soaring higher, too, in my delirium of nervousness, till I could imagine the incalculable increase in size which would be insured, should the lieutenant step into a puddle, and get the thing all wet: he would wear a sand rope for ankle-fetter, upon entering Richmond.

But the most provoking of all the phases to which my humor was reduced, and which my dilapidated body had to submit to, by means of this tape, was the almost irresistible desire to spring lightly forward, and to catch the thing beneath my toe. It invoked me to all sorts of gymnastic efforts. The impulse racked my breast, and set up an argument against every reason in favor of a jog-trotting march for the balance of the daylight. I surveyed the poor lieutenant from head to foot, and pictured to myself his surprise, should he find himself hitched to the ground. He would turn, I thought, with open, questioning eyes, and perhaps look flushed by the accident. He might only hop a step farther on and trust to my not overreaching him. He might, impelled by the influence that tormented me, fall behind me, I had an unwavering conviction that that tape would never be removed—and that, consequently, in some way, the lieutenant, who played guide to it, would be my haunting demon all the weary hours of my march.

Soon after I had conferred my tart speech upon the Sergeant, and had so sealed my failure to gain his grace in behalf of my friend and myself, the Adjutant was at my side. A hale, hearty, well-made man, unperturbed usually, he was now almost another person than himself. I thought I knew what causes produced the palor on his face and the quiver about the loose-hanging under-lip. The good fellow had had in his jacket (before it was stolen) the leave-of-absence which was to have carried him home to be married, and he was to have availed himself of it in a week. Perhaps the thought of his lady gave him the woebegone expression. All sorts of sweet dreams, that had illumined his life for months, and filled up the wide chinks of camp monotony, were now quite bitterly ended—capped by the reality worse than the dream which is called nightmare. His smiling eyes were hooded only a little sooner than were those milder ones at home, no doubt under traced eyebrows and with far finer lashes. The marriage, perforce, was put off. The view of home was put off. Perhaps the Adjutant's solemn quietus, like an extinguisher of the light of his and his sweetheart's hopes, would drop upon him in loathsome Libby, and cancel the leave forever. This, being the weightier thought, was evidently bearing upon his mind.

I had resolved, in a business way, upon two points—perchance brought to my decision through some such tender passages as the above: first, that, as we could not escape from the lines together, he must take the earlier, because, as in mortgages, the better risk; and second, that if he did not answer in a satisfactory manner the one question that I had kept for some time uppermost in my brain to propound to him, he must pocket my North Star.

"Have you a compass?" I muttered, as he edged by me.

"No," he replied.

My second resolution, then, was, that he should carry my compass.

"I've been robbed of everything," he said.

"Take—my—compass—quick!" I returned, and pressed it into his hand.

He was not as good an astronomer as I. He looked a hurried remonstrance at me; but was obliged to hide it at once, and could not, I knew, waste any eloquence now. Although, moreover, he was a lover, Nature had never endowed him with the art of speaking through the eye. There were stronger reasons in favor of his escape than of mine—worldly, if not spiritual—and he suffered from a dangerous nervousness, in dwelling upon the magnitude of the issue before him, which was not in my way.

"It is now five," I said; "at seven, if in such woods as this, you must watch your chance and double."

"Which way?" he asked.

"Travel north-northeast, seven miles," I whispered.

Then, as if anxious to burst into a flood of eager words, he began—

"But you ——"

I looked at him fixedly, and moved off towards my Sergeant. That cursed tape before me now again made a twist in my brain.

I was astonished at my Sergeant's opening a conversation. We were travelling (wearily enough) through a piece of woods, overarching and autumn-tinted, the road being cut down, and, consequently, either side of it walled in by upheaving embankments, green-covered and yellow-fringed, over which the declining sun could not dart its rays upon us. The heavy trains of the entire army were making the march along with us, disturbing the modest influencee of the spot—some trundling forward in the van, others toiling after in our rear, the tending angels of all being drowsy, in the shape of the lazy teamsters astride their beasts. Only that peculiar music, made up of the ponderous thud, (the birds had all grown still,) or tramp of the men, for a bass—of the clink and clatter of the canteens for a treble—and of a little broken conversation, in the whining, drawling tones of the guard, on their own side of the lines, and so with no quieting weight upon their tongues, for a viva-voce accompaniment—broke the sweet summer stillness. The shafts of sunlight bridging the road above our heads, making a golden ether-plank for the air-insects to cross upon, and lighting up the veins in the trembling leaves as the breeze put them to confusion, set me to thinking of the eyebrows that the Adjutant was engaged to, and, no doubt, of eyebrows in general. A cool air, smelling of mould and fallen leaves, perhaps a little damp, fell upon us here. The charms of nature may have loosened the sergeant's tongue.

"I was captured in Mar'land," he began, looking straight before him, but of course honoring me with his address.

I was grateful to him, a little for companionship's sake, but chiefly for here giving me a chance that I had hoped for, as I deemed it of considerable value—I mean, a chance to dig down to the mine of good feeling, to the heart of this gray-covered, slumbering crater, that, an hour since, had thrust out that "do;" and also, I was beholden to him for taking my thoughts from the tape.

"How did our boys treat you?" I asked.

"Very fair," he said quickly, with a faint Judas-start, as if it were a matter of conscience, and he had now twitched it out. "They done well by me."

Here was good fortune, indeed! The mine, with all its riches, mine without any digging.

"I am glad of it," I said, briefly; for I saw that laconics were his jewels, perhaps from a sense of expediency as well as of beauty. "We always try to treat you well, whenever we are not firing our guns at you."

This he acknowledged with a nod, but without turning from his look directly front.

"I lay two months in hosp't'l," he began again—"In Fred'r'k, in Mar'land. I was wounded in the hip."

"In '62, I suppose?" said I.

"Yes, at Boonsboro'."

Here the conversation ended as suddenly as it had opened. It was very clear that the sergeant had said his last word for some time. But I was convinced in my own mind that at length more good would fall to my lot.

He pondered the matter some ten minutes, and then quite overwhelmed me with his story.

"One of your boys," he began, "lay wounded by me on the field—of a ball in the lungs—and wanted some water. Whenever he spoke, he threw out blood, and wasn't likely to live, nohow. I said—

"'Yank, will you take my tin?'—for there was a drop in it yet, and I rolled on my side and gave it him.

"'I am goiu' to die,' he said.

"'Yes,' says I.'

"'They'll treat you well,' he said; 'they'll carry you to the hosp't'l, and I hope you'll live to git home.'

"'Thank you,' says I.

"He gave me some 'baccy and a roll of money.

"'The paymaster's been about, and he gave me more'n I want now. You'll want 'baccy in hosp't'l, you'll want it all,' he said.

"And he run over in blood and died. He gave me right smart of money. I rolled away from him when he died, and they took me to hosp't'l."

The sergeant paused for my comment.

Under my peculiar circumstances, I was very much touched by this story.

"Poor fellow! many such a one has gone to his account," I said, sadly.

"And I want to give back some of the money to you," said the sergeant.

I looked at him in astonishment.

"You'll want it down there, as much as you can git. I have no need of it. It a'n't mine. It's his'n."

The sergeant had evidently taken it in trust.

"What claim have I to it?" I asked.

"Any poor fellow's got a claim to it. It's meant to help poor fellows, that money is. It's a dead man's work."

I was more than ever touched now, in the presence of the wealth of this mine which I had tapped.

"I will take some of it, sergeant," I replied; "and I shall do my best to use it as well as you have."

(This incident, strange to say, in its display of human purity, almost tempted me to abandon my scheme of escape, and to go with the sergeant down to Richmond. But he was no measure of his fellows.)

After that we chatted easily off and on, and had a feeling of confidence in each other which a two or three days' march could not alone have created.

At about half after six that night, (I had made the sergeant take my watch, which otherwise I should surely be robbed of, I told him; and he gave me the time,) at about half after six, two officers came riding furiously up to our mild officer and kept along with him for awhile, making three dim figures above our heads (they only were mounted) in the forest shades, in place of the one that, unlike the erl-king, had continued on his way harmlessly from our outset. Their consultation over, the two strangers dashed over snapping weeds and underbrush to the command on ahead, and our mild officer ordered our column (of prisoners) to halt. We were in the woods still, but we had emerged from between those sun-spanned embankments some time since. The ground was ill-chosen by our gentle ruler, but he may have depended much upon his men, whose vigilance, no doubt, he had before tried in the fall of day. They seemed to me but a handful, and only a sieve for their charge to dribble through, the latter aided by the time and place in their work of dropping off. I drew closer to the Adjutant.

"Say what you have to say for home, in case we miss," I said, and in the confusion of the halt I could talk rather freely. "Your time has come now."

"You will write, if I'm not heard from—and—my love to my"—— he gurgled.

"Yes, yes," I said, cheerily. "All right, old fellow, we'll both laugh over this, some day."

I gave him a moment.

"You'll do me the same favor, if I don't happen to turn up," I said; and we seized each other's hands. "You have the compass, you know the way. There is nothing more, I believe, Ned?" I said, hastily, and looked into his eyes.

"I shall watch my chance as the wagons pass; there is nothing more," he replied; and we parted immediately.

It was as if we had agreed to toss pennies for the guillotine. I had no time to think further of him, for my own plans were maturing.

It was soon whispered about that we were to let the trains get ahead of us, since it was necessary that they should move faster; and the Rebel authorities, I presume, had decided to save their transportation, at the risk even of their captives. One or other, then, it seemed likely, would be taken. The Yankees were driving us before them, having reversed the fortunes of the day, and, perhaps, might liberate the prisoners who so impeded this retreat. We stood, I presume, for half an hour, drawn up in a compressed mass upon the skirt of the highway, whilst, startled by fear, a powerful task-master over teamsters, the late drowsy drivers urged forward their toil-worn trains. It was seasonable, but I believed that my time had not yet come. The deep shades encouraged me, but I awaited the hour that I had hit upon. I thought for a moment of the Adjutant, perhaps then ducking his head beneath the bushes, and watching, with his heart beating time, the heavy mass by degrees moving on. I trusted that the wheel of Fortune, whilst these other wheels were moving Rebelward, had turned in his favor.

At a little after seven we again fell into line, not having allowed all the teams to pass us: and as the same fortune would have it, we left the woods behind us, and marched between open meadows It had now grown quite dark. My face wore a look of anxiety as I noted the wide stretch of open field beyond me.

But there were as anxious faces as mine among the groups of Rebel officers who rode slowly along the lines. This was the chill season of perturbation to the hot-blooded gentlemen. Some communications were passing rapidly between the commander of our detachment and the commander of the army. Things were not working satisfactorily to either. Orderlies were dispatched to the front and to the rear, and the air-blasting bugle was sounded on ahead, as if to chide the teamsters. When we had marched up an ascent, and were on the brow of a low ridge, we were halted, and then turned into an open field. It was decided, apparently, that the rest of the train should pass us.

No doubt I should here have all the graces of a ready pen at my beck, honey-dipped, or Vulcan-forged, in accordance with my humor, whether sad or harsh, in making up the climax of my account; for at this spot the good writer would be most impressive in his language, and set the reader in a tremble. We waited for seventy minutes in this road-side field, the prisoners resignedly huddling together, with the callous guards making a circle about them. Let me enlarge upon our circumstances. The time, about eight o'clock; the atmosphere thick and murky; the sky overcast, promising a warm September night. I asked the sergeant if it would rain, and said carelessly some other trifles. I feigned an excess of sleepiness. Our detachment lay some thirty yards from the highway, spreading into a thin line of no evenness, running parallel with the road, which, in the gloom, our eyes could scarcely find. The exigencies of the service had proved the ruin of the fences; and only here and there in the vague darkness could one make out the black bunch of a shadowy tree. Just beyond us—for my sergeant and myself stood at the rear extremity, the land's-end of this shoal of prisoners, outside of the ring of guards sparely posted, on the very top of the ridge which we had ascended—was a low clump of bushes, (perhaps neck-high,) squat and opaque, with much the appearance of a ball of boxwood. The hill, I thought, rolled away on either side—taking some comfort to myself in the conjecture; and the inky leaf globe, only a little more sombre than its background, could not be seen in a hasty glance. This clump, in its innocent blackness, would cover my purposed guilt; and I resolved to confide to it alone the secret crime of my attempted escape.

But there were calculations to be made, which I set about with the eagerness which the occasion required, watching my sergeant very closely as my head ran over its prospectus. And, first, if he stood by my side, I revolved, I could not by any chance whisper my tale to the silent bushes; although, if, at the favorable moment, when the squad was ordered to march, he but stepped a feather's-throw in advance of me, the confession could be readily made. His presence would frustrate my plans. There was one expedient at my beck, but quite hazardous, by the adoption of which against odds I might compass his death and my freedom—a thought which I dismissed on the instant, as it savored of murder and ingratitude. I must trust that he would give me his back, in spite of his sense of responsibility, for a breathing-space ere we "fell in." With his fellow watch-dogs my ruminations had nothing to do. The nearest of them, owing to their scarcity, (and they had grown trebly valuable this campaign, as they had grown rarer,) was not within twenty yards of me. My new world was scarce that distance in the rear. The moment of all moments, the crisis, the vision of a life-time, eddying through the brain in the flash of a powder-pan, and stamping red-hot impressions there, (which in some cases bleach men's hair-roots,) was finally upon me. My sergeant turned from me, and I glided with tiger tread to the bushes, and laid myself down.

I was, of course, between him and my new friends, and I pretended to sleep, so that, if he found me, he could scarce suppose that I meditated leaving him in so loose a manner; and, moreover, my being asleep would follow naturally upon my reiterated statement that I was sleepy. It would have been madness to have taken the other side, since, if there found, the case against me would have been clear. I deponded, as is ever man's wont, upon mere shadows to do much for me where I was.

I have thought often since, however, (then other than the deliberate thought which every man in trying circumstances has experienced, and which centres upon one subject, being so severe a tension of all the faculties as to seem no thought at all, was impossible,) that it would be unwise, and perhaps a stumbling-block to future Union captives in the custody of that horrid host, to ascribe my unbroken rest under those dry, dusty bush-branches simply to the heavy darkness of the evening excluding all other causes from participation in my affairs. It was usually cloudy, the sky resting overhead like a hanging pall, and threatening rain with thunder every moment, as is almost always the case after a hotly contested engagement. The fight that morning had been a grand one, (quite a Horace Vernet picture,) and hence the clouds that night. But I must own that I give my Sergeant a place in my memory now with a feeling of gratitude, induced thereto by the strong supposition that he did not allow himself to see me as I glided under cover. I count much upon his heart, as shown in his little proffered narrative. The other guards on the line might readily have failed to notice me, the more so as I had a special attendant to see to my wants; and I should have been very sorry, indeed, had one of them disturbed my rest. But my sergeant was not three body-lengths from me when I slipped away from his protection; and although he had his back turned, I am inclined to think that he had only fewer eyes than Argus. His general reputation, to be read in his bearing, pronounced him vigilant, and his every act betokened circumspection. Far be it from me, however, to bespatter his character by avowing him negligent in performing his duty in this case, whilst lauding him for his honest devotion to his masters. It may have been a part of his care to see the squad "fall in," and he could not abandon that line of his duty to search for a stray officer, smooth-spoken and amiable, to whom he had just shown a kindness. The bustle and unnatural darkness of the moment could not inspire one who was not a demon with a demonical desire to set a screeching and rash body of troopers upon my track. The detachment of melancholy mutes was moving off when I tried my fate; and he could have had but little time to think ere the miserable men were in the distance. The farther my sergeant journeyed, the more likely he was to keep quiet upon my subject.

I experienced very peculiar emotions as I lay there and found myself alone. I even seemed to hear the whine of the soldiery, the ringing of canteens and sabres, and the peculiar sound of the tramping feet, long after they had passed away—chanting, in my soul's depths, my fluttering song of triumph to that imagined accompaniment. I had an almost accurate idea of where I was, having observed our course quite closely during the day, and proposed going over very nearly the same ground in the next twenty four hours. I had already decided in my own mind that the Rebel general was making a retreat before the gallant General Sheridan, whose outposts I hoped soon to come upon. But dangers many, and some hidden, lay thick-strewn upon my path, which had not run over roses hither; and I deemed it best to encumber the cold earth for an hour, ere I sallied from my Moses-harbor.

The highway lay within a hundred feet of me; and as I intended taking up my lost stitches of the morning in a peculiar (and, I hoped, original) manner, having no knowledge of the country beyond the line of our late march, I was obliged to count upon keeping within sound of the troops and wagons travelling there, if I desired at all to gain my end. The Adjutant T—— had my compass, and was, I trusted, quite free from danger as I remained supinely within hail of men who would be delighted to shoot me. His image, as I fancied him, cumbersome and crouching, as he hurried along, dodging from tree to tree, reminded me of the hunts which the chivalry indulge in farther south, (near that very horrible Andersonville slaughter-house,) where the bay of the blood-hound rings over the marshes, and the pack is let loose in the clear morning air, crystal-bright and all aglow, to lap up the dew with overhanging tongues, and to run down escaped prisoners. There is no poetical charm attaching to that pack, although Pan never played his reeds in a more poetical country; and its existence and employment are solemnly sober truths. They made me very grave, suggesting, as they did, some other dangers to which I was then liable. After working myself into a nervous state of body, I began pulling off my coat, leaving my shoulder-straps therewith, to play the part of asterisks, and explain who was within. My pantaloons the soil would soon make as white as a gray-back's; and my cap was to stay with the uniform, to grace some indigent discoverer of the other side.

When I had secreted my money in my waist'band, (not deeming my orderly's suggestion feasible,) and had strapped my suspenders tightly about my body, I worked my way round the bushes to the other side of the clump. As I had expected, I found an even sweep downwards of meadow land, stretching parallel with the road, and as far before me as I could see through the darkness.

I got myself flat upon the ground, with my feet, as in Christian burial, pointing towards the east—for there the highway ran—and with my handkerchief bound about my head. I then commenced rolling as gently as possible down the grassy declivity.

I should be unable to give any account of my thoughts during the first half-hour of my novel evolutions. I moved at one time slowly, at another rapidly, as the ideas of prudence and danger by turns reigned in my bosom. I risked much in being obliged to keep in line with the current of life flowing so noisily the other way, the thought of which spurred me onward; and I had far to go, and not a very great endurance to fall back upon—a reflection which counselled a cautious expenditure of effort. I was anon anxious to fly over the hard lumps of earth and pricking straw-blades—anon, eager to move gently, with deliberate hand upon the brake. I suffered much at my elbows, which were crushed as my body passed over them, (a pulverizing process,) and which, as I had clasped my arms across my breast, were most palpably in the way. It seemed as if they would be unhinged. My feet, too, demonstrated to me the causes of the circular motion of a pen-holder or a ruler when started down a desk-lid, and had the same influence upon my course as the pin-point has upon the whole pin when in motion. My head and upper members inclined to swing in a circle about my feet. I spent much labor upon this defaulting portion of Æsop's body of sovereign independencies, which threatened the greatest difficulties. My neck, also, in the narrow space between the band of my low woollen shirt and my hair-roots, was harassed at every turn by the needle-bed of short grass that I passed over; and the loose stones, stubble and gravel that had irritated the skin, worked their way beneath the garment. I was quite a child's rattle, full of pebbles. I could have endured all this for a long while, however, the spirit then actuating me being one of those unreflecting forces which would (as a last resort) have carried me down the same slope in a Regulus cask. But after travelling quite a distance, I began to revolve, not any complete remedy for these manifold ills, but some amelioration of the exaggerated violence of their sway. I tore one sleeve from my undershirt and wound that around my neck. I held my arms straight down my side and flat against my body. Nothing short of amputation could have crushed the rebellion in my lower members, and so (with the power to amputate not abandoned) I nursed them into insolence with a compromise.

A psychological history of the uneven progress of that billowy retreat would be as far beyond my reach as of the ten minutes of outset-trial. I thought only vaguely of my home, of my regiment, of my moments of danger in past life. I listened during that night till my sense of hearing changed from a passive to an active sense. I got my neck sadly cramped in lifting my head from the ground every time my body rolled face upward to gain some knowledge of the enemy. My imagination started up all sorts of shapes about me. The damp, heavy atmosphere sent a chill through my veins. I apprehended rain. I soon, also, began to think of daylight, (before which I had so many hours,) and to wonder how I should secrete myself after sunrise. I did not feel hungry; but I had not gone far before I felt the faint longings of thirst.

The ground, too, over which I travelled, was not all meadow land, and had worse features than grass-swords and gravel bullets. I did not find many fences, but I crossed innumerable small streams and one heavy hedge.

I noticed that by degrees, judging from the sound, the rebel troops were getting by, only dropping along finally in dish-water driblets—and that, at last, but scattering bodies of infantry, and at intervals some wagons, occupied the road, moving like dark lobsters in the midnight mists. I could not take to it myself, because of them; and I knew too well how full it would be of stragglers, those worthless gleanings of an army, even after the rear-guard had swept onwards. But I did not hesitate to erect my body from its voluntary abasement, and to make walking a branch of my exercise, when convinced that only vagrants could chance to see me. They never capture prisoners on either side. Thus was I enabled for two hours before sunrise to accomplish more than twice as much as my five hours' rolling labors had attained.

The long-expected rain began to fall in a heavy mist at about dawn, and shortly grew in importance, till the windows of heaven were wide open and it became a settled pour. Most fortunately, by that time I had entered some of the woods we had passed through in the journey of the previous day, and had fair shelter (from Aurora, not Pluvius) within my reach. It was a colossal pepper-box lid, that could keep men from seeing through it, but not the rain from dropping in. My first impulse was to make a fire, so chilled to the very marrow was I in the early morning air, that chilliest of all atmospheres, and so wet was I also in my light summer garments. But of course Prudence had no word in that matter, nor any countenance for a suggestion so reckless, and my soberer senses got to casting about for a fitting retreat ere broad day lay before me. I must reconnoitre, I thought, dripping at every point, like a convict in the marshes, before I continued a tramp here that might expose me to a scouting party at any moment. That hunger, too, which had not troubled me in the night-hours, came upon me now and urged very suggestive hints. I had made a cup of my hands more than once, and slaked my thirst from the streams in my way, Narcissus-fashion; but nothing solid had passed my lips for seventeen hours. First, logs and leaves for a cover, then food, then a critical examination of my position, were my objects, as I hastily settled my plans. The thought of the intelligent contraband, so beyond ordinary human excellence in the richness of his heart, who might minister to all my wants, (as without question many such had done to my distressed brethren flying from Libby,) and whose homely traits become to us golden virtues in moments of suffering, crossed my brain as the depression of hunger increased. Very dim visions of clean and savory cooking haunted me as I took off my boots and shook the water from them. I could not imagine anything to equal in value a good steak or a hot hash; nor could I check my feeling, a hopeless feeling, at having many a time and oft partaken of like viands, perhaps unappreciatively. The slimy dirt of my uppers soiled my hands as I endeavored to make myself less uncomfortable, and I took the shirt-sleeve from my neck, as the driest article about me upon which to wipe them. Near by lay the trunk of a large walnut tree, water-logged and growing sponge-moss; and small bushes, like coral reefs in this sea of trouble, were on all sides of me. I had not accomplished much when I heard distinctly the sound of a bugle.

It was, I supposed, about half a mile distant; but there was no knowing how near the wet horsemen whom it signalled might be to my proposed hiding place; and, accordingly, I got hastily down by the walnut, a good squirrel-cover, without shelter or head-piece. I lay along that side of it which was farthest from the road, and durst not move for fear of capture. The woods were quite thick at that place, and from the hidden pathway (now become scarce a highway) a body of the enemy might emerge at any moment. The unwelcome music of their bugle broke the Sabbath stillness of the morning, and interrupted the harmony of the falling rain-drops as they pattered through the great cathedral branches overhead. I spent, I presume, two hours in this lazy manner, without thought of any food, and scarce daring to look about me. During the first half of that period I heard the bugle thrice send its clear, ringing notes—for it is sometimes lark-throated—through the tree-aisles and under the half-arches above me, the tones lingering in waves on the air, and not failing to startle me. At the first commanding blast I got to watching for the troops that did not come forth at all. Being quite three grasshopper's flights from the road, I could reconnoitre the few rods of it passing near me with comparative ease and safety, and the intentness of my look-out drove thoughts of discomfort from my head. The silence grew oppressive to one who had been perforce so long alone. The thought that at times man has to avoid his fellow-beings in his misery, lest his misery be augmented, was productive of a tender feeling of self-pity in my bosom, which, perhaps, (strange to say,) was a source of some comfort to me. I had, I found, awakened a present sympathy in my case, the passive part of my nature having enlisted its kindly feeling in behalf of the bespattered, dripping gentleman who lay there before it, a sad mass of ooze, soaking on wet leaves. I was growing reflective over my woes, when the second blast broke upon my ear, and I started much as young ladies do at the sudden gun which, on the boards, sends the unholy Caspar to his account.

In a word, I was worn out, wet and hungry; and and become so unstrung, in the accumulated discomforts of the roll from Rebeldom, and the rain of the last stages of my journey, that I could not control my growing nervousness. Having waited a full hour from the third signal-call of the bugle, I jumped desperately to my feet, with a mind made up to hazard everything. Many unlucky fellows, escaping from their captors, have toiled with a wonderful energy, and have failed, when worthy of immediate success, if we rate them by (the war standard) their bravery and coolness. They succumb to fever, and despair finally, but a few moments ere the object of their toils would drop before them. It is ill-advised ever to cast one's hopes adrift as long as life is in us—an imprudence of which I myself was guilty, and which might have carried me back to thraldom. The dragging anchor may fasten, spell-bound by some fluke-enamored reef, as the vessel seems on the point of striking. I jumped to my feet in desperation, and walked hastily nearer home. I allowed no after-thought in the premises, but decided to dodge from tree to tree, like the hunting Indian, as long as my present humor impelled me.

I know not how far I advanced thus, through the most desperate (but to the reader, whom I commiserate, least interesting) stage of my adventure—nor anything of my thoughts or emotions, after the hot resolve had taken held of me. I was in a fever, a mad fever, the evidence of cold, and the handiwork of the past night's rolling-mill, and, I doubt not, was entirely unfitted to evade the enemy with presence of mind or skill. I did not pause till I heard the sound of axes, and the confused noises of a body of men.

I then again took the serpent's position upon the earth, after he, like myself, had lost his Eden, and summoned my oft-trusted counsellors, my ears, to their familiar duty of serving for all my senses in one. The sounds were very distinct indeed; I could even hear the men's voices, chopped up by their active tools; and I knew, by the noise of their labors, that they were driving stakes into the ground. It could not be the Rebels, I thought, in camp this distance in the rear; it might be our men, I hoped, pushing our advance up the Valley. I drew carefully forward on hands and knees.

In a little while I saw a bending figure, with its back to me, holding something that I could not see over a smoking bundle of fagots. There was a poncho about the neck, that covered it down to the ground, and in the morning gray, the figure, the colonnade of tree-trunks, the lazy smoke, a cabinet picture, wore an India-rubber look.

Presently another came up to my first discovery, as if emerging from the bustle elsewhere, and stood erect before him, seeming almost as wet as myself. There was a tasselled bugle in his hand, covered with a corner of his poncho, under which he had a cavalry sabre. He wore, also, a dripping cavalry cord round his hat. After a few words, the two sat upon their heels before the fire, which they bent over, paternally, to protect, watching the thing that was cooking.

Having drawn myself cautiously nearer, I waited a long while for one of the men to display his colors.

The bugler was burnishing his instrument upon his blouse beneath his rubber, hazarding some chance notes under shelter, as he laughed and chatted with his friend. He would, apparently, consult with him of his performance; and he finally lifted himself upon his feet, with the instrument tight to his lips. He then blew a rasping, grating blast upon the air, ear-splitting and dissonant, that was his own rendition of a few bars of Yankee Doodle.

The blouse, being dark, had given me much hope; the air gave me certainty; and before the bugler could wind his final note, I became one of the group.

My pantaloons showed that I was an officer, but in all other respects I appeared less than a highwayman. Accustomed to roughness, however, the men before me could not have divined that I was miserable, had not my appearance been by a few degrees more wretched than that of the most dilapidated of warriors. They gave over, the one his mess, the other his music, for a second, to inquire into my circumstances, and then conducted me to the Major who had command of the detachment some quarter of a mile in the rear.

The eight days' leave-of-absence that was given me, after a full report at headquarters, garnished with less ornament than the present record, afforded me an opportunity to reach my physician in time to have it extended by ten more; and in that period I learned from a letter, written in a thin, peaked hand, that the Adjutant T—— had escaped, but had been shot in the thigh. The compass, that had been his cloud by day and pillar of fire by night during his sad exodus, was returned to me, with his old lady-mother's thanks. Many simple, yet touching, speeches welled up from her rich heart, and shone on the thin white paper; and, no doubt, her great, manly son was tended by another, whilst, at her escritoire, the kindly epistle was made for me. In the subsequent hurry of camp-life, I received a second, that contained all those mournful expressions of resignation, and dependence upon the Higher Power, which broken-hearted Christians so sweetly utter. The Adjutant T——, indeed, had received his solemn quietus in running from the Libby Prison, and the extinguisher of his life was down.—Atlantic Monthly.

THE BITER BIT.

THE sun is in the sky, mother, the flowers are springing fair,
And the melody of woodland birds is stirring in the air;
The river, smiling to the sky, glides onward to the sea,
And happiness is everywhere, oh mother, but with me!

They are going to the church, mother, I hear the marriage bell;
It booms along the upland,—oh! it haunts me like a knell;
He leads her on his arm, mother, he cheers her faltering step,
And closely to his side she clings—she does, the demirep!

They are crossing by the stile, mother, where we so oft have stood,
The stile beside the shady thorn, at the corner of the wood:
And the boughs, that wont to murmur back the words that won my ear,
Wave their silver branches o'er him, as he leads his bridal fere.

He will pass beside the stream, mother, where first my hand he pressed,
By the meadow where, with quivering lip, his passion he confessed;
And down the hedgerows where we've strayed again and yet again;
But he will not think of me, mother, his broken-hearted Jane!

He said that I was proud, mother, that I looked for rank and gold,
He said I did not love him—he said my words were cold;
He said I kept him off and on, in hopes of higher game—
And it may be that I did, mother; but who hasn't done the same?

I did not know my heart, mother—I know it now too late:
I thought that I without a pang could wed some nobler mate;
But no nobler suitor sought me—and he has taken wing,
And my heart is gone, and I am left a lone and blighted thing.

You may lay me in my bed, mother, my head is throbbing sore;
And, mother, prithee, let the sheets be duly aired before;
And, if you'd please, my mother, dear, your poor desponding child,
Draw me a pot of beer, mother, and, mother, draw it mild!

IN THE MUD.

IF any man enjoys a holiday, it is a clerk in a public office; and in 184–, no one started for his Winter trip with more pleasant anticipations than those with which I locked my desk in the Title Deeds Office, and started for North Lincolnshire. I have never been there since that time; indeed if I ever have a nightmare, I wake from an awful dream of having been smothered under the wolds of that county, as the giants of old were whelmed under Ætna. But to my tale.

Does the reader know Great Grimsby? Why it should be called Great Grimsby, I cannot tell, as no one was ever known to have found his way to Little Grimsby. Let that pass. A popular novelist of the present day, when he wished to send the villain of his story to a place where he might reasonably be supposed able to escape observation, relegated him to Grimsby. His selection was most judicious. Does any one even know of a friend who has ever been at Great Grimsby? Dull and dreary is it, twining its slow length along one long street leading to the sea, like some wounded serpent dragging itself to the water, doubled up here and there into a convulsive row of houses, writhing at another part into a knot of two or three dingy cottages. North and south of it are spread out extensive tracts of mud and waste land, called "fytties," always dismal in the midst of Summer, and tenfold more lonely and dismal when the tide of the Humber runs down, and invites numerous flocks of water birds to their favorite haunts. In company with the cousin at whose house I was staying, I used frequently during the Winter to resort to those mud flats after nightfall, and we seldom failed to obtain a shot or two at wild-fowl.

The modus operandi of the gunners of these shores is very simple. They dig a hole during the day in a mud-bank some way above low-water mark. Towards nightfall they deposit a bundle of straw in it, on which they stand. They may wait in the cold for hours without seeing a feather, but generally patience is rewarded by getting a flying shot at a party of ducks or curlew coming to feed.

One night (shall I ever forget it?) my cousin had to spend at Lincoln on the Grand Jury. After dinner an immoderate desire took possession of me to ramble towards the Humber with my gun. It was a bright, frosty night, and all the time my hostess was singing to amuse me, I sat on thorns longing to start for the shore. At length she wished me "good night," when I informed her an uncontrollable liking had come over me to look up the ducks. Would she trust me with the key, and I could let myself in after an hour or two without disturbing any one? She tried to dissuade me, urging the charms of the chimney corner and a cigar to no purpose. Then she reminded me I might easily lose myself, but I assured her it was a bright moonlight. Finally, she gave me the key, and I took my double-barrel, and made direct for the "fytties."

A walk of half an hour brought me to the bank, kept up at great expense by the proprietors of the land to prevent the waters overflowing the rescued meadows, at the back of which lie the remnants of an old dyke, that may have been constructed for the same purpose by the Romans. Beyond the low wailing of the green plovers overhead, I had heard nothing during my walk. Now, as I cautiously wormed myself up the bank, and raised my head, an animated scene presented itself. Some 800 yards off, at the edge of the Humber, whither the tiny wavelets glittered in the moonlight, was a fluttering of innumerable wings, a screaming, calling, and clanging sound of many flocks of wildfowl. I thought of Homer's account of Cayster's banks, and longed to be nearer the water's edge, as little companies of eighteen or twenty ducks and curlew flew along every now and then parallel to it. A little way to my right a range of stakes and large boulders ran towards the sea. Trusting to them for concealment, I crept noiselessly along, keeping well in the shade, and with great trouble getting a hundred yards nearer the wildfowl, without as yet rousing their suspicions.

All at once I heard a loud rustle behind me. A flock of teal came overhead, flying towards the sea from some inland pond, and without a moment's hesitation, I fired both barrels into their centre. Much to my delight one bird fluttered to the ground sixty yards in front of me, evidently winged, but still, from the speed with which it made for the water, likely yet to escape me, as I had no retriever.

With a noise like distant thunder, and a loud screaming and whistling, all the wildfowl for a mile or more, either way, rose up into the air and made off. Over shingle and over banks of black mud, I ran towards my prize, now sticking in the tenacious mire, at other times plunging deep into a pool that tried my Cording's waterproofing capabilities to the full.

The moon was just passing behind a bank of clouds as I made my way to the reef of mud on which the teal lay seemingly dying. It had fluttered on some way, and drawn me four or five hundred yards from the embankment. The mud was particularly yielding here; but I pushed on to the edge of a little dip, six yards down which lay the bird, dead, as I now saw.

The descent was not inviting, but I went on bravely over the ankles in the hateful black slime. As I seized my bird, being rather out of breath, I slipped and fell on hands and knees, luckily saving my gun from getting damp. With a little difficulty, I recovered my feet, turned and commenced ascending the mud-bank. To my horror I slipped back at every step. My previous foot-tracks were little pools. The treacherous water filled them in immediately. With perspiration breaking out coldly over me, I once more madly essayed the ascent. It was only three yards in height, but that hid the country and even the moon from me. It was preposterous to be foiled at such a trifle. For full five minutes, I tried my best to mount the incline; but only made about a yard of it, the mud higher up the slope being less tenacious than where with some difficulty I maintained my stand. Now I began to wish I had listened to reason, and remained at home. However, there was nothing for it but, weak as I felt myself becoming, to drain my flask (which luckily retained a few mouthfuls from our last expedition,) and once more to essay to return.

After long struggling and expending all my little remaining strength in vain, I became seriously alarmed, and fired several times by way of bringing help. Alas! the nearest house was two miles away. It was half-past eleven on a bitter March night, and even professional gunners, I felt, would hardly come from Grimsby, so far down the river, except by the merest chance.

Then I shouted myself hoarse, and once more wasted my little remaining strength in trying to get out of the muddy prison in which I found myself. One side was just as bad as the other. I heard the far-off lapping of the sea in the death-like silence of that intensely bitter night; behind me, on the opposite side, the call of a duck or the scream of a curlew occasionally rendered the stillness more intolerable.

I am not one given to despair, so I made up my mind to wait till morning, and trust either to my absence from the house creating a hue and cry, or else, I knew the coastguard boat passed down at dawn, and I could hail them as they rowed by. I had wasted all my powder and shot already. Wrapping my plaid still tighter round my breast, cold and wet as I was, I lighted my pipe and rested, leaning on my gun.

Soon I began to perceive myself sinking into the mud. I extricated myself, only to sink deeper. Thoroughly alarmed, I put away my pipe, and paced away to the other end of my prison, about ten yards off. Once more I madly essayed to scale the bank. Down on my knees I crawled, and driving the gun into the yielding mud, strove to use it as a lever. Vain thought! I slipped down again up to the knees in water and mud.

Then the full horror of my position dawned upon me. I had heard there were dangerous quicksands on this coast. The water was up to my thighs now. No plunging was of any avail; it seemed to do harm. I had dropped my gun; reason almost left me; in unutterable despair I looked to the skies. The stars twinkled brightly, and here and there a fleecy cloud passed majestically along. There was no sympathy with them. Far over a purple waste of sea, I saw the Spurn light at the extremity of the Yorkshire coast. It was just seven miles off, but I screamed and shouted to it for help. Now I had settled down to my waist. A burst of tears came to my relief. To die, when so full of strength and hopes! Oh, horrible! Another plunge. I settled down deeper still, and bade farewell then to the world. Like some cold and slimy serpent, the pit slowly drew me downwards; button after button of my waistcoat disappeared. I spread out my hands and gasped in utter despair. What touched one foot? I kicked and felt something hard. The other reached firm ground too. Oh, joy! I was on the gravel subsoil, and though I could not stir, I could not sink deeper! The revulsion of feeling was as dreadful as had been my previous despair. I shouted wildly for delight. It was like being once more restored to life.

Soon my raptures abated. I was up to my arms in deadly cold water; the reef I stood on fell away, I found by experiment, on all sides. My pipe was hopelessly wet. No one could see my head and shoulders from the land. The ordinary path was two or three hundred yards behind me. The wind was rising and blowing seawards. All possibility now, even if I survived the cold, of being heard by a chance passer-by, was utterly hopeless.

Hour after hour of that pitiless night passed on. Only my head and shoulders seemed alive, so intense was the chill that had seized my body. Would it never end? The wildfowl passed gleefully over head; the stars grew dim, the Spurn light that had glared all night so fixedly on my misery that I had been tempted to curse it, paled; faint white streaks broke through the deep dark blue behind it. At last day was coming; but my senses were so deranged, I hardly knew whether it was not all a hideous dream. Was I alive, or a disembodied ghost? No form of punishment that even Dante's prolific imagination shadowed out can equal the sufferings of that night. Youth is full of hope, or I had flung myself forward many times, and perished in the hateful ooze.

With gray dawn the thin mists that floated over the river disappeared, and from one end of my prison I saw two outward bound steamers majestically passing along. Then I turned instinctively to the other, the inland narrow view between the two banks. In the far distance, joy of joys! a man approached! Long before he could possibly have heard me, I shouted wildly. It was my cousin's groom, evidently looking for me. He turned away, and my heart sank within me; no, he is turning again, and scanning the mud flats. I shouted and screamed in a vain attempt to make myself heard over the raging winds that so often sweep over the "fytties." I raised my hands and plunged in the mud once more, but to no purpose. He seemed again to be drawing towards me. Had he seen me? I redoubled my shrieks. Alas! he turned his back, and soon passed beyond the limits of my view.

Then I gave in. It was useless to struggle any more. I must have swooned. When I revived, horror of horrors! the tide was coming in!—cheerily rippling against the breeze, and circling round some large boulder or stake, and then swallowing it up. It was but a hundred yards from me now, and the distance momentarily lessened. Anything is better than to be slowly drowned, I thought. Oh, for a dry death! One more plunge; all was softening around me. The first ripple came into my prison. Perhaps (as I could swim) I might manage, after all, to wriggle out! Hope revived! the first wave washed over my mouth and nose; as I opened my eyes a boat passed along not thirty yards from me. How I shouted! One long wail cut abruptly short by a wave! They had heard me, and turned her head near me. I could just raise my hands and arms. More amazed than words could tell, a hardy coast-guardsman leapt into the ooze, holding on by the boat with one hand, and grasping me with the other. The next wave dashed the boat on me, and I fainted. A rope was flung round my body, I heard afterwards, and two or three of the men pulled me in, minus shoes and stockings, and nearly dead with exhaustion and terror. After a long attack of brain fever I slowly came round; and now you will not be surprised to hear me say, how sincerely I detest Lincolnshire.

SCRATCHING POSTS, LUXURIES FOR CATTLE.—Sidney Smith used to say: "I am for all cheap luxuries, even for animals; now all animals have a passion for scratching their backbones; they break down gates and palings to effect this. Look! there is my universal scratcher, a sharp-edged pole, resting on a high and low post, adapted to every height, from a horse to a lamb. Even the Edinburgh reviewer can take his turn. You have no idea how popular it is. I have not had a gate broken since I put it up. I have it in all my fields."

THE Stranger's List of the several hotels at Mittwoch, Baden, June 14th, had the following: "Mr. F. B. Winchester, mit Gattin, Boston; Hr. H. C. Jarett mit Fam. und Bedien, Baltimore; Miss Stuart, und Mr. Paul Plumer, Boston; Hr. Edward Wigglesworth mit Familie und Bed., Boston; Mrs. MacLanahan mit Bed., und Mr. George MacLanahan, New York." The latter is none other than Major Gen. Geo. B. McClellan, late commander of the Army of the Potomac.

THE STAMMERING WIFE.

BY J. G. SAXE.

I.

WHEN, deeply in love with Miss Emily Pryne,
I vowed, if the maiden would only be mine,
I would always endeavor to please her—
She blushed her consent, though the stuttering lass
Said never a word, except, "You're an ass—
An ass—an ass-idous teaser!"

II.

But when we were married, I found to my ruth
The stammering lady had spoken the truth,
For often, in obvious dudgeon,
She'd say—if I ventured to give her a jog
In the way of reproof—"You're a dog—you're a dog—
A dog-matic curmudgeon."

III.

And once when I said, we can hardly afford
This extravagant style, with our moderate hoard,
And hinted we ought to be wiser,
She looked, I assure you, exceedingly blue,
And fretfully cried, "You 're a Jew—you 're a Jew,
A very ju-dicious adviser!"

IV.

Again, when it happened that, wishing to shirk]
Some rather unpleasant and arduous work,
I begged her to go to a neighbor,
She wanted to know why I made such a fuss,
And saucily said: "You're a cus—cus—cus—
And were always ac-cus-tomed to labor!"

V.

Out of temper at last with the insolent dame,
And feeling that Madame was greatly to blame
To scold me instead of caressing,
I mimicked her speech—like a churl as I am—
And angrily said: "You 're a dam—dam—dam—
A damage instead of a blessing!"

A SPECTRAL HOLIDAY.

THE papers for a week past have announced the second picnic of the season for Spiritualists and "friends of progress," all in favor of free discussion and disinthrallment being invited. These terms of welcome embracing everybody of our acquaintance, we took the Weehawken ferry boat at 9 o'clock yesterday, and were landed at the end of a sand wharf, along which, at intervals, isolated beer houses stood shrinking from the sun, and which terminated in a series of gardens at the foot of a flight of inconceivably high steps. The most ambitious of these gardens was called "Ned Wilson's Ruins," which we recognized around certain tables, drinking New Jersey Bourbon; the top of the flight of steps disclosed, upon the crest of Weehawken, a number of beer booths and quite a pleasant highland, excellently shaded. This spot was dubbed "Palisade Park," and the Spiritualists were in full blast when we got there.

The Spiritualist can no more be mistaken than the African. Owing to his love of his species, he cannot cut his hair. His whiskers grow rank and weedy like a graveyard, and are at first of radical red, to indicate his fiery spirit, and soon after grow quite white, in witness of his sage principles. From looking into the future over-much, this gentleman's eyes grow anxious as one's unbefriended, and he seems to groan under a load severer than that of Atlas, who carried this world only. The Spiritualist and Friend of Progress is a double-humped Atlas, therefore and it would be hard to say whether his learning or his language was the most unwieldly.

We fell in with a party of these philanthropists soon after leaving the New York-side ferry. Said one of them:

"Brother Downs, what is the object of your gathering?"

"Soul-blending, simply blending," said the other; "our poor human weakness craves crab-apples; we are earthy; we are weary over much intuition!"

"Precisely so," answered a third, whose name was Simpson; "the acme of being, even in this sphere of conformation, could not stand the imponderable."

"Yes," said Brother Downs, "it is hot!"

Introducing ourself, we learned that the prime mover in the affair was Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis, a disemboweller of the profound sciences, and late editor of the Herald of Truth, a paper which never had a daily issue. Mr. Davis' paper suspended, owing to the fact that all his subscribers became editors, and switched off into new realms of being, whither the mails could not follow.

So he started a school, and taught a sort of natural religion, which eschewed small tooth-combs, and shears, and tobacco in every form.

Personally, Mr. Davis is a very springy and handsome gentleman, whose eye is direct and enthusiastic, and whose hair is not so long that it will not turn under. At present, he is teaching by the light of the future a few ardent young mediums and gentlemen, who seemed to be merry and thoughtless enough as they tumbled over the grass and joined in a cotillion.

The picnic was entirely free from formality, and until the close of the day no attempts were made to go at speech-making. Brother Farnsworth, having a flow of humor, sufficiently large to turn the crank of a hand-organ, however, let fly some unabbreviated and energetic remarks, the which, to put in the World's type, would, by their indurate and jaw-breaking character, quite clogg our press, and must be omitted.

Having had the good fortune to fall in with a little party who were singing:

"I am coming, sister Mary,
I am coming, by-and-by,"

we were soon wedged into the centre of a congregation of the master-spirits of the day. For a time, the conversation was by-play, great deference being paid to the witticisms of the higher lights, and uproarious laughter following their sallies. Some of the concourse were eating vegetable diet only; some only bread made of flour and cold water; others went the whole hog almost literally, and drank from large tin cups. The principal female was short and fat, and was understood to be Mrs. Careys, a noted medium. One of the gentlemen asked her if, without incommoding herself she could go into the trance state for a few moments.

"You mean under the influence!" said Mrs. Careys.

The gentleman stood corrected. Mrs. Careys finished eating her strawberries, dropped her saucer, and was in the other world in no time. It was explained by a bystander, that she was possessed of the spirit of an Indian chief, and she gave us the war whoop in so stirring a style, that a quantity of prowling rowdies attempted to scale the park-wall and scalp the whole party Mrs. Careys then carried on an animated conversation with everybody around her, recognizing them with her corporeal eyes, and playfully nick-naming them; then she sang:

"The poor old slave has gone to rest,
We know that he is free."

And after a sort of snatch at the air, a swallow, and indications of great exhaustion, came back to terra firma, and took some more strawberries.

The next feature was an explanation in reply to a question, from one Mr. Androms. The latter gentleman is looked up to with much reverence by the entire community, as he is engaged upon an epitomization of the sciences, having discovered the key common to them all. He is also constructing a universal language, whereby the vulgar vernacular and the scientific terms of the spiritualists can be compounded, and Hottentot comprehend Patagonian. Mr. Androms is a tall, thin-nosed, precise gentleman, wearing a benign smile in one eye, while he analyzes with the other. The question was:

"Brother Androms, do you desire assistance from spiritualism in your great work?"

"I have sometimes thought," said Mr. Androms, "that in my moments of intricacy, when the mind's eye failed to divide the possible from the absolute, a touch of the vital fluid has greatly acuminated my diagnosis. But I am not prepared to say that these tests validate the whole tendency of the discovery. My objects are never individual. Toto cælo! I do not stop with the spheres."

A young woman, without any solicitation whatever, here began to dream, and describe a scene in the Perfect Land. She was heard attentively, until her paroxyism continuing beyond limit, the party sung the spirit away with

"There's a good time coming friends, and the fiddler on the dancing-platform summoned off the whole party.
A good time coming,"

The proprietor of the place, unusued to parties which neither smoked nor tippled, beheld the dancing with great aversion; but it was original, to our mind, and some of its merrier phases bore a striking resemblance to the tripping of three-legged tables.

An excellent old gentleman directed the fiddler,, and called out the wrong figures in the wrong places, laughing at his own mistakes till the perspiration ran in sluices down his face, but greatly incommoding an astronomical gentleman, whose grave and bearded face seemed to have at one period been the focus of a telescope. Young females in Shaker hats—which, bending double, wrapped them up like a blanket—whirled round with veritable discoverers of perpetual motion, and folks who could swing near a ceiling on their coat tails. The child-medium was there, the seventh child of the seventh daughter, holding in her little fist sinews of mahogany, and the spiritual couple, who had embraced the faith together and given all they had to the poor, turned corners and made their heels fly as if they were catching up to the future.

"Go on, brethren!" said Mr. Davis, "the essence of the present is the athletic. Chasse! the foot is a divine propulsion; second couple forward! Swing partners! All time is before us; we have widened existence and brought the skies a little nearer. March!"

The younger portion of the party seemed abundantly able to take care of itself, and had no fear of ghosts, for it wandered off into the remoteness of the woods, and bathed its little feet in puddles.

"But puddles," said Mr. Downs, "are not to be despised; they shadow the blue sky. And perchance, young sir, even our incoherent and superficial moods contain in their depths more than muddiness."

How shall we describe a galaxy of these pioneers of truth (there having been nothing true since the beginning) loitering at the base of one of "Drake's Plantation" rocks, pitching penuies. But Newton was struck in the eye with a pippin.

It occured to us to ask Mr. Androms why the associated friends of progress had selected Paliasde Park for their picnic. He regarded us fondly for a moment, and then led the way to the rear of the principal restaurant. We saw some unfinished stone walls, a fragmentary tower, and many arched wiudows falling to decay.

"It was intended for a church!" we exclaimed.

"Thus high," answered Mr. Androms, "in the empyrean, shall we build science above the relics of dead creeds. Long as the Palisades, and high as Weehawken. The vagary of the carnal and the confused must cease; we act upon the true poles, and the spiritual is our needle. Entity and ideal have had their indigenous period; the actual and the exotic succeed."

This seemed to us so very reasonable that we said we would remember it, and came away. Everybody behaved excellently.—N. Y. World.

BIERSTADT'S "YOSEMITE."

THE art critic of the New York Review gives the following notice of this picture. Those who had the privilege of seeing the original sketches from which the picture is taken, during the artist's stay in this city, will thoroughly appreciate and endorse the critic:

"We now pass by a whole crowd of insipid mediocrities to the picture which is esseutially, both in regard to its size, quality and subject, the picture of the collection. We refer to Mr. A. Bierstadt's "Looking Down Yosemite Valley, California." A magnificeut treatment of a magnificent subject; and well calculated to sustain this most rising artist's already great reputation; an artist of whom America may justly be proud as her hitherto greatest master in landscape painting. Nature here gives you one of her grandest and most exceptional surprises. We are ushered into one of the stupendous gorges of Californian sceuery—the rocks piled up with that gigautic abruptness of form so peculiar to the geological formation of the Pacific coast mountains. Bathed in a rich fulness of sunlight, upheave these terrible stone masses, the clouds far ovehead reflect the same golden glory, and the stream that has worn its way through this adamantine wall with the tireless patience of au eternity, also repeats as much of the scene as the over-towering rocks vouchsafe to its narrowed surface. On the right we have a primeval wood quietly reposing in the shadows of these enormous mountains. There is a peculiar quality, however, about the sunshine in this picture which suggests dryness, but not heat; it is cold sunlight; albeit, we believe the Californiau thermometer is accustomed to range among the 120's. Mr. Bierstadt evidently sets out to be the exponent of these grand exceptional phases of Nature; he is oue to whom

'The tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood
Their colors and their forms,
Are an appetite, a feeling and a love
That have no need of a remoter charm,
By thought supplied, or any interest
Unborrowed from the eye.'

And though it has been often-time complained of, that he does not devote his magnificent powers to the illustratiou of more familiar and every day scenes, still we ourselves do not sympathize with that criticism. We look on this artist's superb Rocky Mountain views as contributions not only to art, but to science as well, so truthful and photographic are they in detail. We confess, moreover, to a predilection for the outre and the odd in the bypaths of nature as yet untrodden. Why will not some of our yachting fraternity take Mr. Bierstadt this season up Icelandward? How sublime from his pencil would be a reproduction of the wierd aud awful glories of the Almanna-jau or the Hrafna-jau!"

MILLAIS' "TRUST ME."—A lady aud gentleman were standing before a picture by Millais, which most of our readers still remember, called "Trust Me," in which an elderly squire confronts his daughter, who holds a letter behind her back. The picture admits of more explanations than one, for M. Millais has that rare faculty of putting blended expressions into his faces, which often puzzle us, as the expression of real faces do. But the one this gentleman was overheard giving his compauion is as new, we will be bound to say, to the painter as to our readers. "You see," he said, "she has got a letter in her hand, which she is keeping back from the man in the red coat. Well, he is the postman, and has just given her the letter; I suppose it's from abroad. She hasn't the money to pay the postage, so she says—'Trust me.'" The explanation was given with perfect gravity, and in apparent good faith. It was gratefully accepted in the same spirit, and the lady seemed proud of her companion's intelligence in so rapidly reading the riddle.—The Shilling Magazine.

NOTICE.

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1865.

SAN FRANCISCO BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

A FEW months ago several charitable gentlemen of this city resolved to organize a society for the relief of the destitute and needy. They had become convinced through some experience in private acts of benevoleuce, as well as through positive knowledge of the steady increase of want and suffering in this apparently prosperous and wealthy city, that the work of charity would be more readily compassed by the incorporation of a public association that should have systematic forms and methods of relief and succor, and that should absorb the sporadic, spasmodic, and irregular charities of our citizens. This conviction resulted in the organization of the San Francisco Benevolent Association Scarcely had these newly accredited Samaritans begun their work before they learned its real magnitude and extent. Thousands of dollars of outlay, and years of patient care and investigation were before them. Destitution hitherto hidden and unsuspected, besieged the door of the relieving office and clamored for food, for raiment, for lodging, for work. Our Samaritan friends found that to do anything they must double their efforts and quadruple their expenses. They had gone too far to withdraw. Their work of fancied supererorgation had become, really, one of obligation, and the very existence of several poor families actually hung upon their hands. They were spending double the amount of their monthly subscriptions. In this emergency, they resolved upon an appeal to the city government, and to the public. The substance of that appeal has been promulgated in the daily papers. It only remains to be seen with what response it will be met.

In the meantime, if any curious reader wishes to learn some of the workings of the Association, he will find in an unpretentious office on Pine street, not far from the gayest and most prosperous part of Montgomery street, and near two of the principal theatres, some information that will contrast strangely with the impression left by the appearance of this fashionable thoroughfare, and he may hear the story of some griefs that will outvie the fictitious sorrows of the drama. He will find that in a community where sudden wealth is common and fortunes are rapidly made—fortunes are as rapidly lost and the extreme of sudden poverty is as well known. He will learn how terrible this poverty becomes in a strange land, where the protection of kindred cannot reach, and where friendships are too recent and acquaintanceship too slight to justify the sufferer's appeal. He will learn, if he does not already know, how the avenues of trade are choked with helpless and hopeless applicants, and how difficult it is to get the means of earning bread honestly, even in this energetic, bustling city. The manager will tell him of the kind of relief most usually demanded—the old burden of the old story—how loss of work brings, first despair, then drunkenness, then wife-beating, down to the usual climax of a family turned homeless in the street by an irate landlord, at which point in the story the Society steps in as landlord, father and protector. He will be told of the more delicate and isolated cases of educated and accomplished men and women, standing before the counter of the Relieving Office, and claiming, with hesitating lip and flushing cheek, the means of keeping within them that life with which, in too many cases they often part, rather than come to this humiliation. It will be some satisfaction to the curious stranger to learn that in these cases, delicacy is met with delicacy, that—thanks to the chivalry which invests all true charity—the pride of those unfortunate suppliants is respected and recognized, and that they are taught to believe that they have but accepted a loan from a sympathizing friend, which they may repay at their leisure. He will be pleased to learn that this same sensible and manly theory is adopted by the society in most cases, to relieve the applicant from a sense of obligation, and that, as an evidence that this standard of human virtues is not too exalted, in several instances the Association has been duly reimbursed by former recipients of its bounty. He will find in this a definition of their enunciated policy, that "the poor shall be made to help themselves," and become parties to their own advancement.

For objects like these, and to carry on the system glanced at above, the San Francisco Benevolent Association to-day stands before our people, itself a supplicant. We cannot believe that its appeal will pass unheeded. The monthly subscriptions of San Francisco to the Sanitary Commission have shown her citizens capable of sustained and generous almsgiving. That noble charity is now extinct, with the struggle and sacrifices that called it into existence. The Almoner who takes its place is born of that Peace, whose homely lesson is equally suggestive of "good will to men."

[For the Californian.]

COMPLETE LETTER-WRITING.

TO write an elegant letter has been usually considered a desirable accomplishment Aids to this form of composition have been repeatedly offered to the public at prices, which, contrasted with the quality of moral sentiment and rhetorical elegance exhibited in the examples given for imitation, have seemed cheap indeed. For myself, although I am one of those who usually hang spell-bound over a blank sheet of letter paper, and with difficulty sound their "dim perilous way" to a safe anchorage at the bottom of the sheet, I have availed myself but sparingly of these adventitious auxiliaries, and have a reasonable doubt whether this faculty of clever letter-writing can be called an accomplishment, or whether excellence therein is to be attained through precept and example. It is true that, in my youth, I was impressed with the history of a boy who wrote his mother a "beautiful letter," and who, said the chronicle, received a "plum cake" in reward. I fear that as an example the story was a signal failure. The general verdict of the juvenile circle of which I was a member, was that the epistolary youth was a prig—a verdict since sustained by my maturer judgment. Indeed, the only boy's-letter I ever thought worth reading was that which Mr. Charles Reade ascribes to Reginald Bazalgette, in one of his later novels—a letter hardly calculated to provoke a reward from the most indulgent parent. The question of what is really meritorious in this kind of composition remains unsettled, and also, whether beautiful letters, written with a more or less remote plum cake contingency, can be claimed to possess this virtue.

Every family possesses its "beautiful letter-writer," and nearly every family has some one member on whom the duty of correspondence mysteriously devolves, and who is looked upon as possessing a superior faculty. A critical analysis of the genius of this member, unfortunately, is very apt to disclose a preternatural tendency, on the part of that individual, to prolixity and verboseness, as well as the fact that his letters are not only too often insufferably stilted and vealy, but that they do not afford any index to the writer's real sentiments. The amount of moral and sentimental platitude that may be palmed off on one's relatives and friends in such cases is really wonderful. Enthusiastic uncles and cousins have been known to prefer their correspondent's description of notable events and occurrences—the correspondent evidently not shrinking from comparison—to those of the most clever professional writers, reading them to strangers with a perceptible mouthing and inordinate emphasis. This exalted praise sometimes results in the rash and premature appearance in print of the "beautiful" correspondent, where, by a system of compensation, he at once finds his level.

Disregard of sincerity and naturalness is the glory of most letter-writers. Two friends, accustomed to the free and simple interchange of thought, being separated, at once fall to filling pages of stilted formulæ—which neither accept as genuine—and to the bandying of fine epithets which they dare not, in ordinary circumstances, bring the tongue to pronounce. It is a knowledge of this propensity which sometimes adds a bitter pang to the parting of friends, each feeling dimly conscious that the other is destined to visit him hereafter as a prosy ghost, which he cannot exorcise. Each knows that the other will feel it necessary to philosophize and moralize in his new condition. Each will be astounded at depths of weaknesses hitherto unsuspected in each other's character. There is nothing so surely demonstrates this half consciousness of folly as the feeling with which we look over an old letter in the hands of a friend. "Is it possible that we wrote thus and so?" is the mental question that flushes our cheeks.

Our previous knowledge of a friend's character seldom affords us any indication of the tone of his letter. People are no more apt to write as we expect them to, than they are bound to act according to our comfortable predictions. Fanciful people very often write practical letters, and almost invariably the epistolary effusions of practical men abound in thin streaks of sentiment and poetry. Among a number of replies to a certain festive invitation, I once observed that the responses from clergymen were invariably the most jocular in intention—albeit somewhat too classical and heavy in execution. It will hardly be deemed probable that a D. D. should, in apologizing for his illness, allude to the possibility of his becoming "clarior e claret," yet such is the lamentable fact, and can be proven.

As there is a predisposition in the best of men to become bores at certain seasons, I look upon the attitude of epistolatory composition as alarmingly conducive to this weakness. With a blank sheet of paper before us, we hold our friends at a cruel disadvantage. We have it all our own way as we proceed to air our pet prejudices and hobbies; there is no one present to controvert, to yawn, to excuse himself, and we expand, we expatiate, we become eloquent. Perhaps we have been accustomed to being snubbed in argument, and are quite willing to improve the occasion by letting our friend know that we too are a logician. I know of nothing so grimly humorous as the story told of our late good President and his patient attitude under the infliction of a wordy Pacific correspondent who, at last, broke him down with a letter of seventy pages. What a picture is offered in the spectacle of this homely rail-splitter whose reverent conscientiousness so sweetened his intercourse with his fellow-men that he achieved that miraculous courtesy which princes and peers have vainly cultivated. What self-abnegation must have been employed in painfully winnowing the grain from all this chaff! Yet I confess I have not been without pity for the infelix epistolizer. Who can tell what dreary opinions on reconstruction, emancipation, and the Monroe doctrine were thus untimely cut off? Who knows what exhaustive and exhausting views of the resources of the Pacific slope were thus obscured? Who can speculate what histories of wrongs and rights and unrecognized merit were thus stopped? Whatever they were, the letter was never read, and yet by some unerring system of compensation, we know the correspondent only through the failure of that which might have kept him unknown.

Letters may be classified as the Business or practical, the Serious or sentimental, the Trifling or jocular. The characteristic of the business letter, legal or commercial, is to assert nothing that cannot be proven—hence this is perhaps the only kind of letter that is worth keeping. There are occasional combinations of this form of epistle, such as Serio-Business or the sentimental and practical letter—letters of condolence, lawyers' announcements of wills, and invitations to funerals and weddings. Indeed, it may be questioned whether all letters with a motive are not business letters. The sign of the Serious or sentimental is generally "Alas!" or the use of "'t were" for "it were," and inordinate poetical quotation. Any letter that begins with a description of scenery, the room in which the writer is sitting, a view from the window, or any allusion to the "setting sun," or other celestial phenomena, may be safely set down as belonging to this class. Remarks concerning the shortness of life, the vanity of human wishes, and all statements in regard to the soul, come under this head. A tendency to double epithets in the address, and a certain rhetorical flourish on approaching the signature, or a blending of the letter and signature, such as "the kindest regards of yours—" generally determine the sentimental form. The use of the word "epistle" for letter has a like significance. The Trifling or jocular is not as easily defined. Any species of mild impertinence or garrulous imbecility, comes under this designation. Slang is perhaps its dominant characteristic. An idiotic use of quotation often constitutes the available capital of a "funny" letter-writer. Reputations for wit are built up in private families, on sentences like the following: "I feel like the 'Last Rose of Summer.'" "Write to me soon, for 'I'm lonely and forsaken.'" "Excuse mistakes, for I'm 'not myself at all.'" It is wonderful what thin potations suffice to intoxicate the social circle. I knew a gentleman whose letters were always received with what the newspaper critics call "shrieks of laughter." Yet the performances of this mad wag consisted in his occupying three sheets of letter-paper with his address and name.

If I were asked what I considered the highest form of epistolary excellence, I should say that, passing by those clever every-day working thoughts of men of genius, which often give us a better idea of their character than their more ambitious productions; passing by the quiet, simple and unaffected utterance of the educated gentleman whose self-poised reputation requires none of these adventitious aids to recognition, I would give the palm to the simplest letter of an honest gentlewoman. In it I should be confident of finding that sincerity and truthfulness without which the most courtly and elegant epistle is but sham and tinsel. In it I should find those instinctive truths which somehow come to the feminine mind as results without the trouble of their recording, as we do, the tedious processes. There is something beautiful and yet terrible in this frankness which invests every woman's letter. The thousand little artifices, coquetries and deceits which belong to their conversation vanish when they commit their white souls to the white paper. From the silliest school girl to the sedatest matron, disguise and digress how they may, the hidden secret, the true object, the real motive of their writing will pop out in every letter. It may be delayed as far as the postscript, but it is sure to come. It will be readily seen that this frankness is as perilous as it is charming. Perhaps I am not prepared to urge the passage of any statute forbidding young women to write, and denying them postal facilities, and it is highly probable that if such were the law they would find some equally dangerous avenue of expression; but this would not and should not prevent those of our own sex who may have become the recipients of these dangerous confidences from guarding them as sacredly as their own honor. If I were the mentor of any young lady-killer, I would advise him to burn his billet-doux, however sweet, promising that if he did not receive his reward in the self-consciousness of a virtuous and manly action, he would at least find his correspondence greatly increased when the fact became known. POPULAR FALLACIES.—No. 2.

THAT THE SUN RISES IN THE EAST AND SETS IN THE WEST.

THIS is one of those approximate truths which are taught us as absolute truths in early youth, and are so confidingly and trustingly adopted that they are seldom questioned in after life, and never unlearned.

In point of fact, the sun never rises in the east to us who live outside the tropics. To illustrate: Whenever the sun rises to us it is exact noon at the place ninety degrees east of us. Now, if we could (the moment the sun rises above our horizon,) travel due east ninety degrees in an instant, we would never find the sun overhead, or vertical, at that place, but always south of the zenith of that place. In other words, the sun, when rising, to us, is never vertical over a place due east of us. Neither in the east, so far as direction on the earth's surface is estimated, nor again in the east as direction is laid off on the celestial sphere, (both the same in reality.) does the sun ever rise to us; for a point in the heavens east of our zenith would always be thirty-eight degrees north of the celestial equator—a point which the sun never reaches.

Again, we are taught that, standing with face to the north and the back to the south, the arms extended at right angles to the body will point east and west. This, in a scientific point of view, or in any exact use of language, is utterly false. All that can be said of it is, that, for short distances, considering it true leads to no gross error. It is even a convenient approximation to the truth, (within those limits.) for many purposes, but it would not be safe to act on it as true in surveying a small farm or in navigating on a dark night from here to the Farallones.

Now, there are only two days in the year when the sun appears to rise in the east and set in the west. These are at the vernal and at the autumnal equinox, or the 21st of March and the 23d of September. On all other days the sun, as most persons, by observation, are aware, appears to rise in the Summer north of east—in the Winter, south of east. At the equinoxes the sun rises in the east point of the horizon. But this east point of the horizon is not east, as we reckon direction on the surface of the globe or on the heavens.

If, for example, on the 21st of March—when the sun appears to be rising exactly in the east—we could travel directly towards him with the speed of thought, we should pass over New Mexico, Texas, the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribean Sea, and along the coast of Guiana, till we reached the equator in mid-ocean, thus travelling mainly in a south easterly direction; and if we continued in the same path, which is the way our right hand points when we face the north, we should strike the coast of Africa not far from the Tropic of Capricorn. Again, if on the 21st of June—when the sun appears to rise farthest north—we could travel instantaneously towards him from San Francisco, we would pass over the continent and not far from Charlestou, S. C., to the parallel of 23 deg. 28 min., in mid-ocean, where the sun would be vertical at that time, or southeasterly again. In fine, to us the sun always rises in the southeast and sets in the southwest.

But some one may say: Our house stands exactly north and south, and in the long days of Summer the sun, at his rising and at his setting, shines into our north windows. True: and therefore you think he rises in the northeast and sets in the northwest, do you? Let us examine the matter. Grant that your house is rectangular, and that one side faces the north fair and square, the other facing the south as fairly and squarely. Now in what direction do the other two perpendicular sides extend? East and west, say you? True, for ordinary purposes of conversation. But the north wall of your house, if continued in the same direction, (or the line of your front fence, if parallel with your house, and if you can more easily imagine that extended indefinitely,) would run on towards the Cape of Good Hope. Is that east of us?

Now this and many other difficulties are cleared up by taking notice of certain facts. If we lived on the equator, the celestial mechanism would seem to revolve with much more simplicity. Facing the north then our right hand would point exactly east and our left hand due west, and the sun would not seem to have such a circuitous diurnal path in the heavens. But we live in latitude about 38 degrees. We have an oblique sphere, and we look at all celestial phenomena obliquely. We do not stand on the globe perpendicular to the axis of the earth, but our feet point to the centre. The plane of our bodies is not the plane of the small circle of latitude on which we live, but facing the north, with our arms extended at right angles, the plane of any man's body would describe a great circle dividing the earth into two hemispheres, and the direction of the arms is in reality all directions, as they would, if produced, box the compass.

There is only one way in which a man could with certainty point to the east. It is this: Suppose a ladder erected against the north side of a house, and making an angle with the ground of 52 degrees, or leaning southward 38 degrees from the perpendicular—equal to the latitude of this place—a man by leaning back on this ladder and extending his arms at right angles would point east and west, for his feet would then be perpendicular to the axis of the earth, and the plane of his body coincide with the plane of the parallel of latitude on which we live. Reference to a globe, or placing an image of a man with arms extended on the terrestrial globe, will make these truths still plainer.

The body of a man standing upright in our latitude describes, during the diurnal revolution of the earth, not a portion of the area of a circle like that of one standing on the equator, but a portion of the convex surface of the frustrum of a cone, whose apex is at the centre of the earth. We stand on the surface of the earth, then, with relation to its axis, like the branches of a cedar tree with relation to the trunk, and our changing zenith-point, as we turn with the earth exactly eastward, while it describes a true east and west line, never at any season of the year describes a line pointing towards the rising or the setting sun.

San Francisco is about on the same parallel as Richmond, Virginia, but it is a great mistake to tell a child that, facing the north and extending his right hand, he points towards Richmond.

THAT A POUND 'S A POUND THE WORLD AROUND.

So far is this from being true, that in no two places unequally distant from the equator is a pound the same thing. It takes more of an article to weigh a pound on the equator than at any place north or south of the equator, and a pound of iron or of any other article is lighter on the equator than the same identical pound of iron or other article would be if carried to latitude 40 deg., and its weight would increase till it reached the pole, where it would be a maximum.

The reason of this is that every point on the equator revolves with the earth's axial rotation, at the rate of about one thousand miles per hour. This velocity of rotation generates a centrifugal force which counteracts, to some extent, the force of gravity, which tends to draw bodies towards the centre of the earth.

As latitude increases, the velocity of rotation diminishes and gravity has more sway, until we reach the pole where a given body would be the heaviest. This principle is recognized in the construction of astronomical clocks, it being well known that the second's pendulum must be somewhat shorter on the equator than elsewhere.

Leaving the domain of absolute truth, and descending to the conventionalities of society, we call attention to what we consider false doctrine in the rule—

THAT A GENTLEMAN SHOULD ALWAYS GIVE A LADY THE INSIDE WALK.

This custom arose several hundred years ago, before the days of pavements and sidewalks, when the streets of London and Paris were narrow and dirty, and when carriages had the right of way in preference to pedestrians. The horsemen and vehicles dashed along, regardless of the wayfarers who picked their way as close to the buildings as possible, and often bespattered by mud from the unswept street.

Then a companion on the outside served as a barrier against sudden collision, as well as a safeguard against frequent soiling of apparel. In those days, too, distinctions of rank were plainly marked in the style of dress. Lords and gentlemen wore ruffles and lace and long stockings, which it was desirable to preserve immaculate. It became a question of rank as to who, among gentlemen, should take the inside, and frequent quarrels arose on this point of giving the wall and taking the wall.

In our days all this is changed, and the custom, which was founded in courtesy and deference to the weaker sex as well as to superiors of one's own sex, has no reason for being perpetuated. In our cities, the outside walk is just as convenient and just as safe for ladies as the inside walk. Oftentimes it is more so, especially when, as is often the case in our streets the inside walk is beset with pitfalls, gratings and trap-doors, or encumbered with boxes and bales of merchandise, or with an array of fancy wares or fruit stands. Many punctilious people, and especially young men, desirous of paying strict observance to traditional etiquette, feel it incumbent on them, when walking with ladies, to keep them on the inside; but, an increasing disregard for the old usage has been observable for many years, and has now become very general, if not almost universal. There is to us something ridiculous, as well as unnecessary, in trying to observe this old custom. A gentleman walks half a mile through our streets with a lady on his arm. In that space he turns and crosses perhaps a dozen times. Each time he must drop her arm and dodge around behind her at the risk of treading on her train, or jostling against a third party, or awakening the lady's apprehension that he may be darting off in the crowd and deserting her, and finally, after some difficulty in our crowded streets, he comes up alongside and makes fast again. This manœuvre is often repeated several times in a few yards.

Besides, it is becoming now the custom, when meeting others, ladies or gentlemen, to turn to the right. No other rule, so simple and so unmistakable can be devised, and in this case it sometimes happens that we give the lady the inside and sometimes the outside. Why not, then, let the old custom fall into utter desuetude? It has served its day, and is no longer needed.

LIBRA.

THEATRICAL TALK.

MR. DAN SETCHELL seems to have taken up the affections of the people of this city just where he left them, judging from the large audience I saw on Thursday evening, when Our American Cousin was played. A more delighted audience I have seldom seen. Mr. Setchell and Mr. Harry Courtaine play together admirably, and the fun which they put into the piece made it appear new to those who had seen it many times before. Mr. Dan Setchell is a whole team in himself—there is no denying it. Leah the Forsook, which is underlined, is, if the London papers are to be believed, and they generally criticise pretty severely, a wonderfully funny extravaganza. This afternoon Our American Cousin will be performed. In the evening, the performance will be for the benefit of the Ellsworth Zouave Guards; the entertainment will consist of Paul Pry, Toodles and a drill by the company.

On Tuesday, a large audience assembled at Wheatleigh's Eureka Theatre, to witness the production of a comedy in three acts, entitled Our Friend from Victoria, being the first attempt at dramatic composition of "Inigo," (Mr. C. H. Webb.) An amusing prologue put the audience in the best of humors. On the first night the piece was marred by two actors who filled important parts being drunk and certainly incapable of doing them justice. On the second night, this was to a certain extent remedied, though many good points were even then destroyed and made away with. The plot offers sufficient material for a farce—I think the author is mistaken in stretching it into a three-act comedy. The next fault is a deficiency of action; the characters either sit, walk or talk, and as, save the hero and heroine, there are few characters in the piece who are interesting, the audience get rather weary. With three such important deficiencies as lack of plot, action, and marked individuality in the characters, it may easily be imagined that the comedy has not proved a very brilliant success. The author appears to have depended for success on smart repartee and puns, some new, and others old acquaintances. The chief character, "Fitz Clarence Witherspoon," (Mr. Wheatleigh,) is an Englishman; in the first two acts he causes amusement by his ignorance of the slang of San Francisco, which "Miss Chopper," (Miss Fanny Morgan Phelps,) a rapid young San Francisco belle, uses profusely. In the last act, the character of Witherspoon undergoes a most extraordinary metamorphosis, and he is as unlike what he was as it is possible to imagine. A period of a few weeks, at most, is all that is allowed for the stupid Dundrearyish Britisher, who is presented as a butt for ridicule, to become a very smart Californian who carries a pistol in his coat-tail pocket, and remarking, "I'm heeled," threatens to shoot through the lining! Perhaps the best scene in the play was where "Fitz Clarence Witherspoon," having been mistaken for Lord Fitz Clarence, received a letter from Samuel Wimblepin and eleven others, requesting him to hold himself in readiness to visit the City Prison, Home of the Inebriate, and other public "institutions," and also to address some half-dozen societies. This displayed much humor, and convulsed the audience with laughter. Had the remainder of the scenes been up to the standard of this, Our Friend from Victoria would be indeed a brilliant comedy. Miss Chopper is a little too broadly drawn; she is supposed to occupy the position of a lady, and yet, on her first introduction to a stranger, makes use of phrases which are not. I am willing to believe, often heard coming from the mouths of ladies in first-class California society. Among other effects, an earthquake is introduced. "Witherspoon" calls for one and it comes shortly afterwards. It did not frighten the audience much; they nodded to it as if to an old acquaintance. The local scenery was very fine. Mr. Wheatleigh, Mrs. Phelps, Mrs. Judah, Mr. Leach, Mr. Percy, and Miss Clarkson did the parts committed to them justice. Mr. Edwin Thorne was very defective. I think "Inigo" will, next time he writes a play, produce a much better one than Our Friend from Victoria; he is fully competent to do so, and has a sufficient fund of wit of his own to refrain from reproducing jokes which have lost the gloss of novelty, in dialogue, as he has done in several instances in the present piece. So much for criticism. On Monday, this comedy, renovated and made better than new, with a new surprise even more startling than the prologue which, on the occasion of its production, made the audience laugh so heartily that they were all satisfied that they had received full value for their money, will be played for the benefit of the author, when, I hope, he will have a good house to recompense him for the agony he must have endured while his play was being tortured to death before him at its very birth. Young dramatic authors ought to have their first efforts criticised; it is good for them, and very few have ever had their first attempt crowned with success. The company at the Eureka has been considerably weakened by several important secessions from it, and Mr. Wheatleigh and Mrs. Phelps, unexceptionably excellent as they are in everything, have a considerable amount of heavy material surrounding them, and it can scarcely be hoped that the leaven of their talent will leaven the whole lump, and transform supers into rising comedians. Mr. Shiels, the Scotch comedian lately from Australia, who joins the Eureka next week, will, if he is really talented, be a most welcome and much needed accession.

This afternoon and evening, the two final performances of Wilson's grand circus will be given. This fact will be enough, I should think, to insure an overflowing tent. The excellent and varied entertainment given by Manager Wilson, excels anything in the way of ring performances ever before offered in San Francisco. The grand equestrian drama of Dick Turpin, is got up in splendid style. Mr. Cooke both in reading and acting "Dick Turpin," displays fine dramatic ability. The pursuit of Turpin with a mounted force is very effective. The comic business, especially where the saddle-girths are loosened, and the pursuers are left scattered over the ring, is very amusing. Carlo's zampillæ rostation leaps are immense. The Buislay family of gymnasts will open with a new and enlarged tent, and a new company, next week.

TOUCHSTONE.

THE DOMICILE ERECTED BY JOHN.

TRANSLATED FROM THE VULGATE OF M. GOOSE, BY A. POPE.

Behold the mansion reared by dœdal Jack!

See the malt stored in many a plethoric sack
In the proud cirque of Ivan's bivouac.

Mark how the Rat's felonious fangs invade
The golden stores in John's pavilion laid.

Anon, with velvet foot and Tarquin strides,
Subtle Grimalkin to his quarry glides—
Grimalkin grim, that slew the fierce rodent—
Whose tooth, insidious, Johann's sackcloth rent.

Lo! now the deep-mouthed Canine Foe's assault,
That vexed avenger of the stolen malt,
Stored in the precincts of that hall
That rose complete at Jack's creative call.

Here stalks the impetuous cow with crumpled horn,
Whereon the exacerbating hound was torn,
Who hayed the feline slaughter-beast that slew
The rat predacious, whose keen fangs ran through
The textile fabrics that involved the grain,
Which lay in Haus' inviolate domain.

Here walks forlorn the damsel crowned with rue,
Lactiferous spots from vaccine dugs who drew,
Of that corniculate beast whose tortuous horn
Tossed to the clouds, in fierce, vindictive scorn,
The hurrying hound, whose braggart bark and stir
Arched the lithe spine and reared the indiguant fur
Of puss, that with vermicidal claw
Struck the weird rat, in whose insatiate maw
Lay reeking malt that erst in Juan's courts we saw.

Robed in senescent garb, that seems in sooth
Too long a prey to Chrono's iron tooth,
Behold the man, whose amorous lips incline
Full with young Eros' osculative sigh,
To the lorn maiden whose lact-albic hands
Drew albulactic wealth from lacteal glands
Of that immortal bovine, by whose horn
Distort to realms ethereal was borne
The beast catulean, vexer of that sly
Ulysses quadrupedal, who made die
The old mordaceous rat that dare devour
Antecedaneous' ale in Johu's domestic bower.

Lo, here! with hirsnte honors doffed, succinct
Of saponaceous locks; the priest who linked
In Hymen's golden bands the torn unthrift
Whose means exiguous stured from many a rift,
Even as he kissed the virgin all forlorn,
Who milked the cow with implicated horn,
Who in fine wrath the canine torturer skied,
That dared to vex the insidious muricide,
Who let auroral effluence through the pelt
Of the sly rat that robbed the house that Jack built.

The loud cantankerous Shanghae comes at last,
Whose shonts aroused the shorn ecclesinst,
Who sealed the vows of Hymen's sacrament
To him who, robed in garments indigent,
Inoculates the damsel lachrymose,
The emulgator of that horrid brute morose,
That tossed the dog, that worried the cat, that kilt
The rat, that ate the malt, that lay in the house that Jack built.

DICKENS ON ACTORS.

[In a late number of All the Year Round, Charles Dickens pays the following tribute to actors:]

I LIKE to meet actors off the stage—not that I am possessed with the fond idea of the stage-struck youth, that all actors are gods, and all actresses goddesses of supernatural beauty (which I have long admitted to be an error,) but because it has been my lot to be thrown a good deal into their society, and because, knowing them well and intimately, I have learned to respect them. There are certain actors and actresses whose hands I am always proud to shake, not because they are eminent tragedians or comedians, but because they are honorable men and women. One of the most simple, unaffected, generous natures I ever met with, is enshrined in the breast of a clown. If any Diogenes should be going about looking for a specimen of a good husband and a good father, I will give him the address of a pantaloon; only regretting that I shall have to request him to ring the top bell. If I cherish a platonic affection for any member of the fair sex, it is for an actress whom everybody loves, because in every relation of life, as wife, mother, daughter, and friend, she is as bright an ornament to her sex as she is to her profession.

Believe me, I am not saying these things in a spirit of exaggerated charity towards a class requiring to be apologized for. I am not adopting the nil nisi bonum maxim, as if I were speaking of the dead. These good people are alive, pursuing an honorable career, and doing good deeds in the sight of many.

I little thonght in my young days, that I should ever have this opinion of play-actors. In the sphere, a very narrow one, in which I imbibed my early ideas, it was broadly inculcated that the theatre was a very wicked place, and that actors and actresses were very wicked people. When I first went to the theatre, on the sly, I had some compunction about it; but not being able to discern any wickedness in connexion with the performance of a beautiful play, in which virtue was rewarded and vice punished, I dismissed the feeling, and was rather pained to think that some particular friends of mine had told me what was not precisely true. It was not until a much later period of my life that I made the acquaintance of actors, and found how much they, too, were belied. I expected to find them at least very knowing persons; but, after spending an evening with a party of players, I came to the conclusion, that I myself, who had been religiously brought up and warned to avoid plays and play-actors, was, in the ways of this wicked world the most knowing person in the company.

I am not going to argue that players are by nature better than other people, but I think their generally single-minded natures may be accounted for rationally enough. In the first place, the ambition to become an actor is an intellectual one, and it will be readily admitted that only a trusting and unsophisticated disposition could hope for a high degree of success in the profession. Next comes in the exalting and refining influence of Shakspeare's poetry, which all actors whether they be destined to shine as the kings of tragedy or the valets of farce, begin by studying. Talk to a low comedian on the subject, and ten to one if he will not confess to you that his first aspirations were in the direction of the tragic. He knew the lofty poetical speeches of Hamlet by heart—never to be forgotten—long before he was driven to lower his attention to the waistcoats of the First Gravedigger. A knowledge of Shakspeare redeems a vast amount of ignorance. An actor's education may be very defective; he may not be able to spell; he may betray in his handwriting and composition a sad want of familiarity with the use of the pen—but he knows Shakspeare by heart. He has all the philosophy of life at the tip of his tongue in Shakspeare's glowing words. We may be very clever and very accomplished, but when the actor leans upon the arm of Shakspeare he is fit company for the best of us. There is another influence for good in the player's profession. It is a precarious one. Nearly all actors begin by meeting difficulties and knowing poverty. It is rarely that any one succeeds without a long struggle. A fellow-feeling makes them wondrous kind. There is scarcely a successful actor living who has not known what it is to be penniless, hungry, and, what is sometimes harder to bear, to be in debt for some miserable trifle among strangers. Thus it is that the most successful among them can always understand and feel for the misfortunes and sorrows of their struggling brethren. If I had not found by experience of them that players are in a remarkable degree kind-hearted, well-disposed people, these considerations alone might have guided me to the conclusion.

That actors have faults and foibles I will not deny. They are men and women, and they have the faults that all men and women have in a greater or less degree. But this I will confidently assert, that actors are not sinners in a greater degree than other classes of society, while in many amiable respects they can lay claim to a larger number of virtues. One of the reasons why they are so constantly traduced is obvious. They live more than any other class under the public eye; there is a strong curiosity about them, and, consequently any dubious story about their mode of life that prejudice may imagine, and the breath of scandal whisper, is rapidly spread abroad and eagerly amplified. How many times have I been told that So-and-So is a very immoral person, when there is nothing on earth of which I am so well assured as that that person is a model of purity and goodness? If scandal hits upon a truth now and then, does it never hit upon a similar truth with regard to other society? Really, upon my conscience, I do not know what class is in a position to throw stones at the players.

Fashionable French Dinner.—A Paris correspondent chats pleasantly about a charming dinner he was invited to, and says: "I was at a small, but pleasant, dinner last night, remarkable for its simple elegance. There was only fourteen guests, therefore the occasion did not call for much display. I will give you the menu—not as anything special, but as an example of what is suitable for such a party. It was written on an embossed card; for more formal occasions the menu is always printed, with the date and address. Some people have gone the length of sending their bill of fare with the note of invitation; but I cannot say it is the fashion, and I hope it never will be; the idea is vulgar in the extreme. There was a novelty for dessert which I had not seen before, namely, violets preserved dry in sugar. They were almost nice eating, and smelt deliciously. The ices were Italian; they were perfect. You are aware that they are always sent up now in little cups of embossed paper; this has been the fashion for the last two or three years. The practice of decanting the champagne also continues to hold ground. The bottle for the champagne is quite unlike anything else. I have seen some which affect a mediæval sort of form. Wine coolers are now almost disused at table; and, in the matter of finger-glasses, there is a new fashion, they are now much smaller, and are shaped like deep saucers, and the newest are made of tinted glass."

Mr. Davis in Prison.—The following exquisite specimen of Copperhead journalism is not a burlesque, as the reader might infer at a first glance, but a clipping from a bona fide editorial. As such, it is commended to the editor of the Examiner. It is copied from the New York Daily News of June 9th:

"The brutal stupidity which has given shape to the treatment of Mr. Jefferson Davis comes out by degrees into the glare of public indignation. The cowardly villany which attempts to accomplish his safe keeping in a cell of thick masonry by riveting fetters on his feet, is the suggestion of a man who is sufficiently base to steal to the unfortunate gentleman's side in the dead of the night to cut his throat. The base spirit which has ordered that wanton outrage upon a man of honor in affliction, has also placed Mr. Davis under a surveillance that nothing but its atrocity saves from laughter. Armed men stand guard over the gallant Mississippian to the number—we pray our readers not to suppose we are romancing—of twenty-six! Two soldiers walk backward and forward in his presence night and day, with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets! And the force thus employed—who must, we are confident, be very tired by this time with the absurdity of the whole performance—is held subject to be brought at a moment's notice to the crash of battle by an ever-present pair of shoulder-straps! Do the people who have ordered all this ridiculous ado think that Mr. Davis cannot be kept from breaking bolts and bars by less than twenty-six rank and file? If the object is to frighten that gallant soldier, then by all means give full effect to the buffoonery carried out for that purpose by firecrackers and tom-toms!

"The absurdity of the disgusting treatment of Mr. Davis changes into a damnable spirit of torture, when we come to consider that he is deprived of pens, ink, pencil, paper, books! The black-hearted villain who has set all this going, appears to pant to put the unfortunate statesman on the rack, and in carrying out that purpose, as far as he dare, has forbidden him the relief of even conversation! The absence of chair, table, knife, fork, or any of the appliances of civilized life from the apartment—which will hereafter be honored as a scene of martyrdom—are of very little moment in illustrating the deviish malice of the man who, having planned the other tortures we have specified, will fall from his place of power under a popular execration that will assign him to the infamy of the blackest villanies known to history."

There is an Eastern tale of a magician who discovered, by his incantation, that the philosopher's stone lay on the bank of a certain river, but was unable to determine its locality more definitely. He, therefore, strolled along the bank with a piece of iron, to which he applied successively all the pebbles he found. As one after another they produced no change in the metal, he flung them into the stream. At last he hit on the object of his search, and the iron became gold in his hand. But, alas! he had become so accustomed to the "tonch and go" movement, that the real stones were involuntarily thrown into the river after the others, and lost to him forever. This story well allegorizes the fate of the coquette. She has tried and discarded so many hearts, that at length she throws away the right one, from pure force of habit.

Lord Eldon and the Chimney-Sweep.—Travelling the circuit with a companion, who, according to a custom not uncommon in those days, always carried pistols with him and placed them under his pillow; they slept one night at an inn, and at dawn of day Mr. Scott discovered in his bedroom a man's figure, seemingly dressed in black. The intruder being sharply challenged, said: "Please your honor, I am only a poor sweep, and I believe I've come down the wrong chimney." "My friend," was the reply, 'you have come down the right; for I give you a sixpence to buy a pot of beer; while the gentleman in the next room sleeps with pistols under his pillow, and had you paid him a visit he would have blown your brains out."—Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors.

Novel Iron-Clad.—A trial has just been made, at Toulon, with an iron-clad, said to be the most useful yet invented. It is a steam gunboat which can be taken to pieces, draws but little water, and may be removed from one place to another by rail or by an ordinary wagon. This boat is said to be ball-proof, draws but three feet of water when fully laden, and carries a battery of rifled guns in a space where forty gunners as well as the guns are protected. The trial was made in the outer roads of the harbor, and succeeded perfectly in regard to speed, precision in firing, and facility of evolution.

An accident occurred on one of the English railroads recently and several persons were killed. A young nobleman was seen running about in search of his valet, whom he feared was among the victims. Presently one of the guards came up to him and said: "My lord, we have found your servant, but he is cut in two." "Then," said he, with the regular Dundreary drawl, "be gwood enough to see in what half he has gwot the key to my carpet bag."

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"Take away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

MUSICAL MATTERS.

THE benefit of Miss Phillips on Wednesday evening was all that the lady could expect, as the Academy was deusely crowded, or her friends desire, as the performances were admirable and worthy of the event. Il Barbiere, alike familiar to the troupe and the public, was given and accepted with equal zest and relish by both the artists and the audience. The last act of Romeo and Juliet was sung very effectively by Miss Phillips and Signorina Sconcia as the conclusion of the entertainment. Miss Phillips as "Romeo," gave the audience a very strong evidence of her tragic abilities—all the more prominently brought forth by the strong contrast formed by the lady's previous performance of the vivacious, arch and coquettish "Rosina." In the departure of Miss Adelaide Phillips, San Francisco loses an excellent comédienne and lyric artiste and the best contralto that ever graced her stage.

I Martiri was performed last evening, the choruses being rendered with even more than the usual effect and ability. This afternoon La Traviata will be presented. Mr. Morley will have a benefit on Thursday evening next, and will produce L' Elisire d' Amore for the attraction.

As the harvest season of benefits is at hand, we trust that the claims of the chorus at this house, whose musical proficiency has aided so much in the successful production of opera, will not be overlooked, and that the public will have an opportunity afforded them of testifying their appreciation of their indefatigable industry and acknowledged professional ability.

HOW PEOPLE TREAT EACH OTHER.—Not one man in ten thousand sees those with whom he associates as they really are. If the prayer of Burns were granted, and we could all see ourselves as others see us, our self-estimates would in all probability be much more erroneous than they are now. The truth is, that we regard each other through a variety of lenses, no one of which is correct. Passion and prejudice, love and hate, benevolence and envy, spectacle our eyes and utterly prevent us from observing accurately. Many whom we deem the porcelain of human clay are mere dirt, and a still greater number of those we put down in our "black-books" are no further off from Heaven, and perchance a little nearer than the censors who condemn them. We habitually undervalue or overvalue each other, and in estimating character, the shrewdest of us only now and then make true appraisal of the virtues and defects of even our closest intimates. It is not just or fair to look at character from a standpoint of one's selection. A man's profile may be unprepossessing, and yet his full face agreeable. The merchant, who gives curt answers in his counting-house, may be a tender husband and father, and a kind helper of the desolate and oppressed. On the other hand, your good-humored person, who is all smiles and sunshine in public, may carry something as hard as the nether millstone, in the place where his heart ought to be Such anomalies are common. There is this comfort, however, for those whose misjudgments of their fellow-mortal lean to the kindly side—such mistakes go to their credit in the great account. He who thinks better of his neighbors than they deserve cannot be a bad man, for the standard by which his judgment is guided, is the goodness of his own heart. It is only the base who believe all men base, or in other words, like themselves. Few, however, are all evil. Even Nero did a good turn to somebody; for, when Rome was rejoicing over his death, some loving hand covered his grave with flowers. Public men are seldom or never fairly judged, at least, while living. However corrupt, they are sure to find eulogists. History may do them justice; but they rarely get it while living, either from friend or foe.

BEDSTEAD SUPERSTITION.—A writer in Notes and Queries, dating his letter from Frankfort-on-the Main, in Germany, says: "Having ordered a neatly constructed, single bedstead, with somewhat high and ornamental sides, I was surprised when it was brought home to find that the ornamentation of one side of the bedstead was not repeated on the opposite side, it being in fact quite plain. I expressed my surprise and dissatisfaction to the maker; saying, that when the head of the bedstead was placed against the wall of a room, the sides hen showing will appear quite unlike—one ornamented, and the other plain. At this the maker expressed his surprise that I should be ignorant of a German custom and prejudice; 'for,' says he, 'in Germany single bedsteads are only placed sideways against a wall, or partition; and only removed from this position, and placed with the head against the wall, to receive a dead body." And the worthy maker assured me that nowhere in Germany could a native be induced to sleep on a single bedstead which had not its side placed against a wall or partition. The same objection does not hold against placing two single bedsteads side by side, with their heads against a wall." He asks if the custom, with the prejudice, prevails in other countries? So far as the United States is concerned, we believe not.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

ON the 9th inst., at Monoville, Patrick Higgins, aged sixty-one years, was killed by the caving of a bank, while mining.

THE Wilmington Journal is to be moved to Los Angeles, where it will be published in future.

THE Post Office in Stockton has been designated by the Post Office Department as a money order office.

THE sawmill of Joseph Gardner, at Liberty Hill, Nevada county, was recently destroyed by fire. About 80,000 feet of lumber and a considerable portion of a valuable flume were also burned.

A BLOCK of marble weighing six tons lies on the levee in Stockton. It is from a quarry at Columbia, and is intended to be used in the Broderick monument.

A TEAMSTER, named N. B. Breese, was killed near Bear Valley recently. In turning a short corner the wagon ran off the road and rolled over the embankment, the wheel passing over his breast, causing instant death.

THE Calaveras Chronicle says that opals have been found in the French Claim, near Mokelumne Hill. They have been polished, and are to be sent for exhibition to the Fair of the Mechanics' Institute, San Francisco.

SIXTY dollars in gold was recently cleaned up from three pans of decomposed rock, in the Wisconsin Ledge, Nevada county, and in one day seven ounces were taken out by one man with a hand mortar.

THE new theatre in this place, says the Nevada Transcript, has been a long time in the hands of workmen, and citizens will be glad to know that there is a prospect of its being speedily finished.

IN Ashton, Colusa county, lately, some of the boys got tired and went to the hay stack to sleep. An Indian boy came along, and seeing a pitch fork lying on the ground, thought it would do better on the stack, so he gave it a pitch and it fell among the sleepers, sticking into Mr. Tate's leg, causing a painful wound.

THE Placerville Mirror of August 14th, says: "As Archbishop Alemany and Father Cotter were coming to this city from Mud Springs, on Saturday evening, in a buggy, some fast drivers in another carriage collided with them with such force as to drive the shaft of their vehicle through the buggy and under the seat on which the reverend gentlemen were sitting. No other harm was done, we believe.

THE farmers in Santa Clara Valley are cutting and threshing out the wild mustard, which grows in great abundance in that section. It has heretofore been treated as a nuisance, and burned to prepare the ground for grain crops. As it has become a marketable commodity, it pays well for harvesting.

THE California State Fair of the present year will commence on the 18th of September, one week later than was at first announced.

AT Canyonville, August 12th, a shooting affair took place between Mynatte and his brother-in-law, Custon. The latter accused Mynatte of ill-treating his sister, to which Mynatte took exceptions, and was about to administer punishment with his fist, when Custon drew a pistol and shot him. It is supposed the wound will prove fatal. Custon claims to have acted in self-defence.

ON the 14th inst., says the Enterprise, a serious accident occurred in the Chollar mine, by which two men, named Charles Bolan and — McGee, came near losing their lives. It occurred from a premature explosion of a blast. It is thought that Bolan is seriously, if not fatally, injured. He is frightfully mangled. McGee is less seriously injured, and will probably recover.

AN Indian was identified at Unionville, lately, as one that participated in the first attack on the whites at Paradise Valley, last Spring. The citizens arrested him, and on the next day, with the assistance of powder and lead, (says the Nevada Transcript,) sent him to the hunting grounds allotted to all good Piute Indians.

THE Mariposa Gazette of August 12th says: "Schuyler Colfax, while travelling to Yosemite, discovered the difference between diplomacy and following a mountain trail. He got things considerably mixed, and found himself several miles out of his latitude. Some sheep ranchers discovered him making a bee line for Brigham Young's kingdom, and placed him upon the right track again, with the understanding that each is to receive a Consulship for meritorious services. Colfax wasn't scared nor nothing—'twas the sheep men!"

A MAN named Griffith was killed while working on a claim at Newark, Sierra county, a few days since, and a man by the name of Collins has been arrested on suspicion. We understand, says the Downieville Messenger, that the assassin stood behind a stump, or tree, and fired from an ambush. We have heard that a difficulty existed between the parties on account of a late lawsuit tried in the District Court at this place, about the claim on which Griffith was working, in which case both parties were witnesses.

THUMBS.—A Scotchman, named Beamish, has recently published a book entitled the Psychonomy of the Thumb. In this work we are informed that idiots have very small and ill-developed thumbs; and as proof of this, we are referred to a plate representing the thumb of the gorilla, from which it seems intended to infer that idiot and gorilla are convertible terms. "Generally," it is said, "a small thumb is the index of vacillation and irresolution; it is also indicative of an accommodating and loving spirit. The large thumb, on the contrary, is the index of a strong will, and little general sympathy—in short, of the heart being in subjection to the head." The question, of course, arises, whether "an accommodating and loving spirit" may not animate a creature who is free from vacillation and irresolution, and then what is the rule of thumb? But to pass on to the "phalanges," or what common people call "joints." The first phalange is "the index of will;" the second, "the index of logical acumen." If you see a man with a "large, broad first phalange," depend upon it he is full of prejudice; and "if the second phalange be also deficient, the prejudice is invincible." If the first phalange be longer and more powerful than the second, the possessor is a man of tyrannous tendencies; if it "be of a medium size, it no longer represents domination, but simply passive resistance;" if it "be short and feeble, power of will will be wanting, and the mind, fluctuating and irresolute, becomes subject to the will of others;" if it "be very short, resistance becomes impossible, and prostration is complete. Gaiety and sadness succeed each other without any apparent cause." If the second phalange "be long and strong, logic and reason prevail over impulse and will. But should the second phalange be short and weak, the individual hesitates to act."

ROGERS' STATUETTES IN ENGLAND.—The London Times says of the exquisite statues of the American sculptor, Rogers:

"All these groups have the refreshing and unmistakable stamp of nationality upon them, and are admirable for life and spirit of action, cleverness of grouping, and truth of expression. This is better work for the plastic artist than imitating antique nudities, or outworn sophicisms. Here, at least, he has themes that come home to the heart of his critics, and breathing models in the world around him."

IT very seldom happens to a man that his business is his pleasure. What is done from necessity, is so often to be done when against the present inclination, and so often fills the mind with anxiety, that an habitual dislike steals upon us, and we shrink involuntarily from the remembrance of our task. This is the reason why almost every one wishes to quit his employment—he does not like another state, but is disgusted with his own.

THE FAIR is great in its success, and the receipts of the first five days were more than sufficient to meet the whole expenses of the exhibition. It has already become fashionable to attend the Fair Levees in the evening, and the immense capacity of the Pavilion is tested to accommodate the thousands who go. It is impossible to record in our limited space all the notable articles on exhibition, but some of the most prominent may be enumerated. The statue of Lincoln by Mezzara is the most commendable work of art—the sewing machines the most useful and ornamental in household mechanism; some beautiful work by the Florence, Singer, and Grover & Baker, (the latter exhibiting a case of richly embroidered goods,) were especially attractive. Drawing-room furniture claimed attention as among the luxuries of a household. A particular green-and-gold brocatel set, with elaborately carved rosewood frames, and a superb new style etegere, by Goodwin & Co., were generally admired. The art galleries were not as full as last year; Lawrence & Houseworth's California stereoscopes seemed to be the centre of attraction This firm also contributes a case of beautifully finished entlery that wins the admiration of many un experienced housewife.

DARING ROBBERY.—On the night of the 16th inst., the Treasurer's office of Macomb county, Mich., was entered, the safe broken open, and robbed of $7,000. The safe was laid upon its back, and the door entirely demolished with a sledge-hammer. We learn from highly authentic sources that the robbers could not have worked over ten minutes before entering the safe.

Persons now using the chilled iron safes should be very careful of depositing large sums of money in them, unless some one is sleeping very nigh. The safe above alluded to was purchased only a few months ago of Lillie's agent, and warranted both fire and burglar-proof. As soon as "Lillie's agent" heard of the robbery, he at once went to Mount Clemens, and (as we are told) tried to reconcile the matter, by offering the county a new safe, and asking at once to remove the old one. However, in this he has been foiled. The question now arises among the County Commissioners, are not Lillie & Son responsible for the stolen property, after warranting their safe both fire and burglar proof? The people of Macomb county are anxious that this thing should be looked to.

THE GRAND SCALE PIANO.—Professor Nash, of New York, one of the oldest teachers and conductors in the city, after using one of Bradbury's New Grand Scales for a concert at the Academy of Music, says:

Dear Sir: I have just used one of your Grand Scale Square Pianos in a concert at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, N. Y., and I say, emphatically, that it is in every particular, as to touch, tone, power and brilliancy, the best square Piano Forte that I have ever played upon, seen or heard. If you continue to make such Pianos as these, you can carry everything before you.

Yours, very truly, F. A. NASH.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent.	per day on a	$50	note.
Two cents	"	$100	"
Ten "	"	$500	"
20 "	"	$1,000	"
$1 "	"	$5,000	"

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ADDENDUM.

Per Overland Telegraph:

PHILADELPHIA, May 17, 1865.

Second Series all sold. Commenced on Third Series. Two hundred and thirty millions (230,000,000) precisely like other two series, except dated 15th July, and Government reserves the right to pay six per cent. in gold instead of 7-30 currency. JAY COOKE,

RARE CHANCE
TO SECURE
DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

A NEW INVENTION!
LEWIS'S
Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,
HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,
With the most astonishing success in curing
Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of
The Throat, Lungs and Chest,
INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

NATURE A MODEL.

WE seldom remember, indeed, how large a portion of our ideas of grace and beauty are derived from the plants; how constantly we turn to them for models. It is worth while to look about the first room you enter, to note how very many proofs of this you will find there. Scarcely an article of furniture, from the most simple and homely to the most elegant and elaborate, but carries about it some imitation of this kind either in its general outline, form or color, or in some lesser details.

Look at the chair on which your friend is sitting; at the carpet beneath your feet; at the paper on the walls; at the curtains which shut out the darkness; at the table near you; at the clock, the picture-frames, the book-ease, the table-covers, the work-box, the inkstand—in short, all the trifling knick-knacks in the room; and on all these you may behold in bolder or in fainter lines a thousand proofs of the debt we owe to the vegetable world, not only for so many of the fabries themselves, but also for the beautiful forms, and colors, and ornaments we seek to imitate. Branches and stems, leaves and tendrils, flowers and fruits, nuts and berries, are everywhere the models.

As for our clothing, in coloring as in its designs, it is a studied reflection of the flowers and fruits and foliage; nay, even the bark and wood and the decayed leaves are imitated. Fueille morte was a very fashionable color in Paris at one time Madame Cotton, the authoress of the Exiles of Siberia had a feuille morte dress which figured in a book of some celebrity a number of years ago. The patterns with which our dresses and shawls are stamped or woven, whether from the looms of France, Italy or Persia, are almost wholly taken from the fields and gardens. Our embroidery, whether on lace, or muslin, or silk, whether it be the work of a Parisian, a Swiss, a Bengalee, or a Chinaman, bears witness to the same impressions. In short, the richest materials and the cheapest, the lightest, and the heaviest, are alike covered with blossoms or vines or leaves in ten thousand combinations; and such has always been the case—the rudest savage, the semi-barbarian, and the most highly-civilized races, have alike turned to the vegetable kingdom for their models.

Architecture, as we all know, has been borrowed almost wholly from the forest, not only in its grander forms, but also in its lesser ornamental parts. The lotus, the honeysuckle, and the acanthus, are found carved on the most ancient works of man yet standing upon the earth—the tombs and temples of Hindostan, Egypt, and Greece.

In short, from the most precious treasures of ancient art down to the works of our own generation, we find the same designs ever recurring. The most durable and costly materials the earth holds in her bosom—stone and marble, gold, silver, and gems—have been made to assume, in a thousand imposing or graceful forms, the lines of the living vegetation. How very many of the proudest works of art would be wanting if there had been no grace and dignity in trees, no beauty in leaves and flowers.

Probably the first rude attempts at pottery were modelled upon the rounded forms of the Eastern gourds. The rinds of vegetables of that kind were doubtless the first vessels used by man in antediluvian times. Wherever they are found, they are now employed in this way by the savage races of the present day.

Before tin-ware and crockery had become so cheap, calabashes or gourds were constantly seen in the farm-houses as water vessels in common use; very possibly a few may yet be found here and there in the rural inland districts at the present time.

Science has been indebted to the works of Nature for many valuable suggestions. In support of this opinion, we may state that the eminent engineer, Mr. Brunel, is said to have taken the idea of his plan of tunneling, (viz., the framework or shield as used under the Thames,) from the operation of the Teredo, a testaceous worm, which is covered with a cylindrical shell, and which bores through the hardest timber. Hence Linnæus called it calamitas navium. The accidental sight of the trunk of an old oak which had been sawed across, suggested to Mr. Smeaton the idea of dove-tailing each course of masonry in the Eddystone Lighthouse. The same happy observation of the wisdom displayed in the works of Nature, led Mr. Watt to deduce the construction of the flexible water-main from the mechanism of the lobster's tail. From a close consideration of the curious structure of the eye, Mr. Dallon contrived his achromatic telescope. "The temple of nature" says an observer of insect life, "is the model of a gorgeous cathedral, and stands distinguished not alone by features of solemn grandeur; the 'loug drawn isle,' whose arches and pillars are the growth of ages; the 'azure vault,' whose lamps are suns and worlds; but no less by a profusion of adornments worthy of the mighty fabric. Flowing draperies of foliage hung on high as curtains—floors tessellated with flowery mosaic, or bespread with verdant velvet—massive pillars and slender shafts marbled with painted lichens and entwined by graceful creepers—all these combine, while they immeasurably eclipse the beauty, to attest the origin of Gothic art." The Poet asks

> Who taught the nations of the field and wood,
> To shun their poison, and to choose their food?
> Prescient, the tides or tempests to withstand,
> Build on the wave, or arch beneath the sand?
> Who made the spider parallels design,
> Sure as Demoivre, without rule or line?
> Who bade the stork, Columbus-like, explore
> Heavens not his own, and worlds unknown before?

IRIS.

WHIMS OF A FRENCH ACTRESS.—"Spiridion," the Paris correspondent of the Boston Saturday Gazette. says: If you would judge of the extravagance of Paris go to the theatres and see how the actresses are dressed. Each tries to out shine the other in the beauty of her diamonds, laces, silks, etc. I heard of a good joke on Mille. Scheider, who plays "La Belle Helene" at the Varieties. She had ordered one of those immense crinoline skirts still in vogue, and which are to be seen, especially in the Avenue des Champs Elysées, covering the whole back and front seats of the carriage in which such actresses throne unattended. No carriage of cotemporary make could hold two women so attired. The crinoline skirt was sent home. She was absent at rehearsal at the time it came. When she rode out that evening she wore it, and immediately on her return home sent it to the tradesman, saying: "I will not wear such a horrid thing. It was so small I got into my carriage with it without the least difficulty." That will show you the tendency of life here; we are all straining after the impossible.

Will you allow me, while this actress' name is on my pen, to tell you an anecdote of her, It will show you how stupid and heartless actresses of her class are—and remember, these are the women who exert supreme influence in France. One evening she went on foot from her house to the theatre, leaning on the arm of the Duke de ——. On the way she noticed in a shop an English trinket. Nothing would do but she must have it, let the cost be what it might. They entered the shop. The trinket had been sold, and no more like it remained on hand; besides, the shopkeeper expected no new supply for a week or ten days. She was vexed, fell into ill humor, and turned the Duke off the moment they reached the theatre door. He said nothing, called a carriage, and ordered the driver to take him to the Northern Railway station. He took the train for Calais and reached London the next morning. He went to buy the desired trinket and took the return train for Paris as soon as he was in possession of it. He reached Paris the same night and went in triumph to Mlle. Scheider's room. When he told her the trouble he was at to gratify her least whim, she burst into a laugh and said: "Ah! vois-tu, mon petit, I never can love you—you are too stupid!" Such is their heart!

UNPROTECTED MALES.

IN a Parliamentary paper recently issued, Captain Tyler informs his chief that "Gentlemen passengers, as well as railway officers of all classes, constantly refuse to travel singly with a stranger of the weaker sex, under the belief that it is only common prudence to avoid in this manner all risk of being accused—for purposes of extortion—of insult or assault." The paragraph has been approvingly quoted in most of the newspapers; and it is seldom that a statement so bold, and at the same time so veracious, appears in a departmental report. Any one who travels much knows that a good deal of alarm has been excited among respectable males of late by the mania which appears to have seized the other sex for imagining, or asserting, that they have been criminally assaulted. Upon railways the terror has become a perfect panic. No man with any consideration for his character will venture within winking distance of any woman who is reasonably good-looking, and young girls are avoided by all prudent persons as if they had the plague. Old women, and very ugly women—women of that sterling repulsiveness that they carry in their faces an unanswerable refutation of any possible charge of assault—are at a high premium just now, especially for long railway journeys. Now is their hour of compensation. The men may turn from them in the drawing-room, may manœuvre to be separated from them at the dinner-table, but in the railway carriage they enjoy a popularity for which bright eyes and youthful cheeks pine in vain. True as the needle to the pole, the cautious passenger flies to the favored seat which places him under the wing of hairless and cappy age.

The alarm is not wholly groundless. A passion for particular kinds of perjury does at particular times infect particular people. In Germany and America, the witchcraft delusion, with all the horrible torments which were inflicted under its influence, was maintained entirely by the apparently disinterested testimony of a considerable number of respectable witnesses. A similar phenomenon occurred in England during the prevalence of the "Popish plot" panic. There seems to be little doubt that the same kind of half-conscious taste for perjury prevails just now among a considerable number of girls, especially very young girls. Several instances have occurred recently in which such accusations have been plainly proved to have been the mere fruit of whim or malice, and there have been many more in which their groundlessness was very apparent, though not distinctly proved. A particularly flagrant case came before the public a short time ago. One Caroline Barker, "a tall, well-dressed young woman, of prepossessing appearance," presented herself at the Coventry police station, and made a charge of indecent assault, accompanied with robbery, against a man with whom she had travelled from Rugby, and who had left the train at Coventry. She minutely described his appearance, and the police were already in quest of the alleged offender, when the Superintendent, by a little judicious cross-examination of the complainant, extracted from her a confession that the whole story was a fiction, invented to cover the loss of her railway ticket. The intended victim of this infamous fabrication had great reason to congratulate himself on having had a very lucky escape of imprisonment or worse. It is not every magistrate, nor even every jury, that would have displayed the sagacity with which the Coventry Police Superintendent detected the falsehood of a plausible and circumstantial invention.

ANECDOTAGE.

MR. Punch has been asked by a variety of Correspondents, who, on the strength of a fortnight's sojourn in an English hotel in Paris assume a taste for French literature, "why he never gives any Charming Little Anecdotes, like those which make Le Grand Journal, Figaro Le Journal de pour Rire, and other delightful Parisian papers so spiritual and so interesting." He has been looking at the intellectual productions in question. They appear to his English mind to be the merest twaddle, flavored by impertinence. In some cases they are simply puffs, no doubt paid for in some coin or other. But as he scorns to be churlish, he has made an arrangement with his Foolish Young Man to supply the article required—omitting, only, (with apologies) another little flavor, very dear to the fashionable patrons and patronesses of Mademoiselle Theresa, but not admired in the British household. The Foolish Young Man has, with commendable promptness, sent in the following specimens of his art—the scenes, of course, being laid in England:

I.

Jones—we all know Jones—is a papa.

The infant is a boy.

Papa Jones turned into Farrance's the other day, in hopes to see some one who would congratulate him on his new honors. Nor was he disappointed. The wit Robinson was there, taking some Punch á la Romaine.

Now Jones calls himself an original writer—and steals.

"You will want godfathers," said Robinson.

"I am puzzled about that."

"Well, ask Paul Bedford to be one."

"Why Paul Bedford?"

"Because your son will then be worthy of his sire."

"How so?"

"He will be called Paul Jones."

Paul Jones was a pirate.

II.

At the Zoological Gardens last Sunday afternoon there was even more than the usual crowd of pious persons eager to admire the works of creation, especially when manufactured into costume.

Jenkins and his friend Tompkins, dressed their best (according to their City lights) sauntered elegantly up to the witty Lady Buckingbury, who was seated near the porcupines.

"Most delightful gardens in London," said Jenkins.

"They would be, but for the beasts," said her ladyship.

III.

Fluker has many good qualities, but he dos not always pay his bills.

If his creditors do not complain, what is that to us?

But they do complain.

His tailor called on him on Tuesday, and pressed for something on account.

Fluker's indomitable good temper would have melted an iceberg, but could not melt the tailor.

"I must make up a large amount on Thursday, sir," he said.

"Do so, and lend it me," said Fluker, "and I will pay your small account on Friday."

The tailor did not seem to see it, and has appealed to his Sovereign.

IV.

Flaps, the publisher, is nevertheless a man of wit.

Dronesby, who writes what nobody reads, met him. Dronesby, who is not young, wears very well, thanks to certain tradesmen.

"How in the world do you keep your beard so black," said Flaps.

"Well, I don't mind telling you," said Dronesby. "I dye it. But don't you tell anybody."

"My dear fellow," said Flaps, "do you think I would publish anything confided to me by you. You ought to know better."—Punch.

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

THE performances of this, the last week of the opera, have been Norma on Monday night—the "Norma" of Signorina Brambilla being one of her best lyric achievements—and I Masnadieri on Wednesday night for the benefit of Signor Orlandini—well and impressively rendered—in which Signorina Brambilla essayed the new character of "Amelia," and achieved a happy success. This lady is worthily held in high estimation by her audiences. Possessing eminent vocal abilities, correct and refined action, and earnest application, we are glad to record her increased popularity. Ernani was sung last night. Lucia di Lammermoor will be the afternoon performance to-day.

The opera season having been one of heavy loss to the management, on Monday night a grand complimentary benefit will be tendered to Mr. Maguire by his fellow citizens, in recognition of his managerial liberality, and the something like Roman virtue he has displayed in completing his operatic contracts. The programme will be an opera melange; four acts from different operas will be given, drawing forth the full strength of the combined troupes. Everybody volunteers for the occasion, and the compliment is most willingly and deservedly tendered. The benefit of the chorus will take place on Thursday night next. We trust that the receipts may prove fully equal to their professional deserts, and that the Academy may be crowded.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

WE sent a wheel-barrow load of queries round to the Mercury office this week. This sort of thing must be put a stop to. We will clear off a few more letters which we have received since we were idiotic enough to meddle with that wretched "monkey on the heart," but must positively refuse to clear up any more moot points in theology, cock-fighting, worsted embroidery, conic sections, poetry, horse-racing, algebra, etiquette, or anything else. Send them to the editor of the Mercury; he likes it.

THIRD CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—No, we cannot give you a list of the English champions of the light weights from 1836 to 1859 inclusive.

A HIGH SCHOOL BOY.—You are a very low school boy to say that your teacher is a "bilk," but if he is really unable to give you information which even a schoolboy should be ashamed of not possessing, and you appear to have a desire to acquire knowledge, we will answer your question. "Lohock" is something to lick, but it would not be proper to call you a lohock, though you might be licked with great propriety.

LITTERATEUR.—The printers call your manuscript "copy," because you copy whole sentences from those books which you get from the Mercantile Library, and, stringing them together with trash of your own, pass the patchwork off as original on the editor of the Weekly Error, but the printer knows it's copy.

A CAREFUL READER.—We were aware that Shakspeare's grammar was execrable, but were not aware that there were as many as eight hundred and seventy-two grammatical errors to be found in his works. We daresay you are right, but cannot afford time to verify your statement.

AN OLD WHIP.—The lines commencing "All the world's a stage," were written by a young man who used to drive the stage between Marysville and Chico. He composed them while on the box. We cannot give you his present address, but are under the impression that a few years ago, while engaged on some more lines, he allowed the lines to slip from his grasp, and the horses running away, he and sixteen passengers were drowned in a creek; but it might have been another man.

INQUISITIVE.—No, we do not consider you impertinent, and have great pleasure in telling you why the "Mouse-Trap" is signed "Trem." It is an abbreviation of the writer's real name which is Delirium Tremens—Christian name Delirium, surname Tremens. Is there anything else you would like to know?

CRAM wishes us to tell him of a handy little volume to carry in the pocket, which will give him information on all subjects. Certainly. The American Encyclopedia is just the thing you want. Webster's Unabridged is the best lexicon for the vest pocket.

OFFICE SEEKER.—We are afraid that you will not succeed in getting the position of clerk in the Post Office as you confess your ignorance of Chinese. You are wrong. The present head of the Post Office is a full-blooded American.

A YOUNG POET.—We sympathize with you. You are quite right. The only reason people call poetry with a well-known name attached to it good, is because of the name. Had the little poem which you enclose in your letter appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, with the name of Longfellow or William Cullen Bryant attached, every one would have gone into ecstacies over it. We regret that we have not room for more than a couple of verses. It is very original in conception, and quite as good as anything that has appeared during the last year in the Eastern periodicals:

TO A VIOLET.

Oh violet, so sweetly blue,
Hide in thy leaves besprent with dew,
And when the day is just begun,
Blushing, peep forth and view the sun.

How sweet thy fragrance beauteous smells
As thou hid'st in the mossy dells—
Like holy incense thy perfume
In vast cathedral's sacred gloom.

A small-minded and fastidious critic might object to the image of a violet blushing, and claim that it must blush blue if it attempted such a thing. We acknowledge the bold and startling originality of the idea, and hail it as an evidence of your genius. You will yet gain a name for yourself. In fifteen or sixteen years more—you say that you have been writing for only seven years—you will gain a high place among American poets.

LOTHARIO.—We cannot tell you whether the lady you refer to has been divorced three times. Write and ask her, enclosing a stamp.

LAURA.—Do we like the Fair? Positively adore them!

FLORA.—Mark Twain, though it may appear paradoxical, is single. Yes; very good-looking.

A GRASS WIDOW.—You need not wear widow's weeds.

BON.—"Colfax," not "Coldfacts."

LITTLE MARY.—Bats don't lay eggs.

SWEETLIPS.—Yes, we always did like it, and don't think it improper.

WETTERAN.—Dry up.

THE little Call is alarmed by the paper on "Popular Fallacies" by "Libra," which appeared in last week's CALIFORNIAN. It cries out "too much science" Too much science for the little Call, we suppose it means. It may be so and yet be not profound. The learned editor does not attempt to refute "Libra's" assertions, he only thinks it is a very dreadful state of things if they are true. He concludes this remarkable article thus:

"We congratulate THE CALIFORNIAN on its new accession, and we would hope that 'Libra' would continue to weigh out his scientific knowledge, were it not for a latent fear we entertain that if he keeps on the way he is going, he will demonstrate there is no such thing as existence, and that all our lives we have been the victims of a wild hallucination in supposing that we lived and breathed."

We sympathize with the fearful little Call. Who knows? It may have been, during the few years it has been in existence, the "victim of a wild hallucination!" "Libra" might undertake to prove logically that the Call has never existed as a newspaper. Wouldn't it then cry out "too much science?" "Libra" shan't do it. The little Call shan't be weighed in the balance. It is a very nice little paper, and shall still continue to be considered the champion of the light weights.

WE have always admired the poetry published in the Flag. If an editorial paragraph calls attention to "a beautiful poem on our fourth page," we turn with avidity to the fourth page. The poets whose productions the Flag ensbrines are not like those of whom Horace said: "Parturiunt montes; nascetur ridiculus mus." There is nothing of the mouse about the beautiful poem which appeared in Thursday's paper, though it may be slightly suggestive of "rat." The name of the author is not familiar. We have never heard of "Andy Eb" before. The use of the old English "bye" in place of "by," is no doubt one of the little affectations excusable in genius—"Bye Andy Eb." We cannot afford room for more than the first verse of this remarkable poem, but the other six are equally as beautiful as the specimen we present:

BYE-ANDY-EB.

Was the parting very bitter? t?
Was the hand-clasp very tigh
Is a storm of tear-drops falling
From a nce all sad and white?
Think not of it, in the future
Calmer, fairer days are nigh;
Gaze not backward, but look onward
For a sunny "bye-aad-bye."

It is peculiar, but very pretty. "Was the parting very bitter? t?" An abbreviation of tea, no doubt. That is, "was the parting as bitter as hemlock tea?" The line "Was the hand-clasp very tigh?" is obscure. In prose, a becomes an before a vowel or silent h, but poetical license may perhaps excuse the use of the expression, "From a ace all sad and white." We don't understand "a storm of rain-drops falling from a ace," but as it is not asserted that such a cloud did fall from a ace, the question being merely asked whether or no such a cloud is falling, we have no fault to find. A, or as we prefer to say an, ace in the hand of an opposing party during a game of bluff, has caused a cloud of sadness, if not positive rain-drops, in many cases, but the ace has been either red or black; but let that pass; Andy Eb is a beautiful poet, and we hope before long to see another of his productions in the Flag, which will evince equal skill in composition. He may write again. Perhaps he will write "in the future calmer." "A future calmer" is an alias for "a sunny bye-and-bye," we imagine. Or it may be another name for the millenium. Under any circumstances, Heaven speed the arrival of "a future calmer."

WE have received the prospectus of the State Fair, to commence at Sacramento on Monday, September 18th, containing a list of premiums. In addition to the fearfully extravagant premiums specified in the list, we are informed "Liberal special premiums for all worthy articles exhibited, not mentioned in the schedule," will be awarded. We are pleased to observe that art is to receive encouragement from the State; a premium of $3 being offered for "the best specimen of animal painting in oil by an American Artist!" Rosa Bonheur would not be allowed to compete for that magnificent premium—she isn't an American. Ah! she'd have a chance after all. We read a little lower down: "For best specimen of animal painting in oil by foreign artist—$3." That lets Rosa Bonheur and Landseer in. That is truly liberal! The best photograph gains a premium of $3, as also will the best pencil drawing by either a lady or gentleman. We have come to the conclusion that exhibitors are not led by the stupendous sums offered as premiums to exhibit at the State Fair, as it in very few cases rises above $3. The best fifty pounds of cheese however, receives five times the reward given to the best oil painting. Would it not be better to spend the money thus divided up into $2 and $3 premiums, on diplomas handsomely engrossed on vellum—something that will serve as a record of the fair. The successful exhibitors who receive $3 premiums will only go and lavish the money as soon as they receive it. We trust that the walls of the Art Union Gallery will not be left bare by the artists' removing their pictures to place them in competition for the premium at the State Fair.

HOME, the spiritual medium, has been badly treated by Louis Napoleon. Louis wished to be put in communication with the spirit of Louis Philippe, and Home determined to give him a striking proof of his power to call the spirits of the departed back to earth. Louis Napoleon went with Home into a dark room, and immediately received a slap in the face. Instead of coming to the most natural conclusion, that Louis Philippe did it, Louis Napoleon believed that Home had actually had the audacity to slap his face! We think if Louis the King and Louis the Emperor did meet as described, it was natural that the Emperor should get his face slapped. Poor Home had notice to quit the French Empire very soon after this occurrence Home seems unable to find a home anywhere; the Pope drove him out of Rome, and now Louis Napoleon banishes him because he introduced him to Louis Philippe and that monarch could not behave himself.

RED JIM.

AN INCIDENT OF AUSTRALIAN LIFE.

FIVE-and-twenty years ago it was such a summer, here in Victoria, as it now is, in the end of February, 1865; that is to say, the bush grass lay long and dead amid moveless trees, or upon the level tiresome plains; the heated air quivered against the low horizon, and danced above the withered verdure like the surroundings of a furnace. There had been a long season of drought. Nothing but dry water-beds, distressed flocks, and wandering cattle, were to be seen anywhere; sometimes the black heavy masses of smoke would roll along the distant sky, and cloud the glaring sun to crimson. Sometimes in the close night a flush, far and faint, told that the conflagrations which had not yet reached us were sweeping many an acre of brush or pasture land. That was a summer I shall never forget! Day after day the same bright dazzling sky, the scorched hills and plains, the weary irritating sense of prostration. I watched the poor half-maddened sheep, weeks upon weeks, with a painful sense of duty which is present to me even now. There was little feed they could eat, and still less of filthy stagnant water in the sole muddy pool on which they depended as their last resource. Listlessly they coiled in the shade, and listlessly I watched them, until I began to experience a fierce irritable longing for rain that haunted me day and night like a coming mania. Some nights I threw myself down outside the hut and tried to sleep, but could find no rest; the still hot atmosphere kept up the fever that was coming upon me, and my slumber was ever broken. I used to envy the old station horse they had left for my use, when I heard him nibbling among the grass in the darkness of the night, and snorting satisfaction that the sun had passed the hazy hills. After a time I began to loathe the weary walk home, and, taking with me an extra supply of tea and damper, made a practice of camping where the sheep camped; visiting my hut only as the vagaries of the flock led me to its vicinity; then I replenished my stock and left with the sheep again. I am sure I had fever, and would soon have become delirious, for I had nothing to relieve the frightful monotony—always the same brazen sky, the dead sweltering heat, the motionless forest, the strange murmurings of the wilderness, like the faint whisperings of a sea-shell.

One night I was lying tossing about in the long grass of a box-swamp, not a mile from my hut. I chose the place because the ground was cooler there than on the unsheltered plain; and as I looked up to the dull starlight, I thought of many of my boyish remembrances, and soon felt that I was weeping what time they surged up dimly and tenderly. How I longed for the bleak sky, the cold bracing wind, and the sleety rain of home! How I longed for the pattering fall of rain on the windows, and the winter comfort of the bright hearthstone. Somehow these longings wove in with my thoughts, and in a partial dream I heard winter sounds again, and loud words and laughter.

I awoke with a sudden start to see, not twenty yards from me, three men hobbling their horses, and speaking to each other about some bush fire. I could hardly persuade myself that I was not still dreaming.

One of the men was soon engaged in lighting a fire on a bare patch of ground, and I was about rising to join them and taste of companionship once more, when a column of flame started up suddenly and displayed a face that caused me to shrink back again, with a muttered thanksgiving that I was not discovered. The face that the fire revealed was known to me at once, though I had never seen it before. The one eye and hair lip of "Red Jim" had been freely spoken about in every shepherd's hut on the surrounding stations. There was no mistaking him. The bull-dog forehead, the heavy jaw, and the thick neck, were features that in themselves would have sufficiently pointed out the identity of this escaped convict. Recalling the man now, as I saw him then, I think I never beheld so perfect an impersonation of a bad criminal. It was well known that Red Jim had escaped from penal servitude, accompanied by three others, but had arrived in this colony alone. It was equally well known that he could only have survived the incredible journey by cannibalism. Red Jim had ruthlessly murdered one or two settlers, against whom he entertained a grudge, and every effort was being made at that time to capture him. There was nothing remarkable in the faces of his companions. They simply showed by word and feature all the evidences of ruffianism usual in men of their class. They had coarse long limbs and heavy reckless faces, seared into revolting harshness by a long series of crimes. Two of them were armed with guns.

These thoughts and observations passed through my mind in much less time than it takes to write them. I was speedily recalled from speculation by hearing the word "Hallelujah" used. Hallelujah was the sobriquet given to my master because of his strictly adhering to the habit of reading prayers in the family, morning and evening. Mr. Christmas was a kind benevolent man, respected on every "hand" on the station; and by none more than by myself. He had been very considerate to me in a late illness, and often sought by many subsequent attentions to cheer the loneliness of my employment. One of Red Jim's companions, in answer to something Red Jim said, replied with an oath:

"Yes, we'll see if his psalm-singing will save him now."

Then the other said: "There are a couple of women there, and we shall have time to give them a taste of bush life before morning."

"Look ye 'ere," growled the ruffian, "we'll roast Hallelujah first. That's our look-out. We'll see if the old prayer-putterer has nothing else to do but help to run us down. Give him a taste of fire before the devil gets him."

I had no fever, no lassitude, now; the prostration of the last few weeks left me as by magic, and in its stead I felt a fierce delightful energy tingling along every nerve. Down close amongst the dry tindering-grass, away with suppressed breath, and a wild feeling closing round my heart, I crept from the vicinity of the fire. I pursued my way, on my hands and knees, with a slow determined care that has since surprised me, avoiding every branch or twig that might crackle in my path. I hurried on past the flock without so much as disturbing a sheep.

Not till a long safe distance intervened did I stand erect, and fresh for the events of the night. Whatever they might be, God in his mercy alone knew.

I turned and saw the black form of the bushrangers moving about the blaze, and with a run I started for the hut. Before a quarter of an hour passed, I saw it dimly against the sky, and almost at the same instant a frightened snort told me that the horse was within a few yards of my course. Uttering a hurried thanksgiving that I had found him so providentially near, I unfastened the hobbles with quick, steady hands, and led him to the threshold.

I put on the patched saddle and bridle, and in another five minutes the fine old cob was stretching himself to a swift free gallop. My mind was too full for thought; but I can remember uttering repeatedly the words, "Thank God!"

What a contrast to the still hot monotonous days, and the enervated frame! What a testimony to the power of mental excitement over bodily lassitude! The horse felt my determination, too, and sped along without pause or stumble. It was seven miles to the station, and the black belts of timber rose and passed and came again, as I hurried on for dear life, over crabbed ground and abrupt hillocks. The brave old cob had as little thought of rest as I had. Once, indeed, he paused at a rocky crossing-place, but immediately resumed the swift pace at which we had started. Have horses intuition or presentiment? I don't know, but I have often wondered at the long unurged gallop of that brave old gelding.

There away beyond in the black darkness, I see something that is not a star. Is it moving, or is it the pace of the horse? It seems extinguished now. No, there it is again. Hurrah, it is a candle. It is the homestead, calm and peaceful. Again, "Thank God."

Strange to say, I never felt such a sense of pleasure as I did when I learned that I had found the house again so quickly—the most familiar point is not easily gained in the trackless bush at night. A minute more, and I had dismounted to take down the slip panels of the station fence. another minute, and I had galloped up to the front entrance at a pace that dashed the gravel from the trim-kept paths.

The door opened, and a gush of light streamed upon the darkness, glinting on the sides of the reeking horse. Mr. Christmas himself—old, but hale and vigorous as many a younger man—peered out into the night, with an expression of surprise. In beyond, were the evidences of calm and refinement. A quiet comfort dwelt in the little glimpse I had of the room, that settled upon me even then, rough bushman as I was, with a pleasing sense. I can recall myself, bending below the withers of the panting horse, to peer under the rather low verandah, my dress wet with perspiration from his heavy sides, and my hand pressing the moisture from his shoulder till I heard it fall pattering on the gravel.

Mr. Christmas thought it was the working overseer, for he said, "Is that you, Curran?" and without waiting for a reply, he turned to place the light upon the table, and then stepped out to where I was.

"Well, Curran, what is it? I thought you were at the fire."

"It is not Curran, sir," I replied, "but Ned, the shepherd, I have come to tell you—"

"Better have your supper first, Ned. You've had a hard ride, I see. Are the sheep all right?"

"There is no time for supper. Red Jim!" I hurriedly told him all I knew. He heard me to the end without once interrupting, and then said quickly, "Come in. There is indeed no time to lose."

I stepped after him across the pleasant room, where there were seated two ladies reading.

"Ladies," said Mr. Christmas, as gracefully as though I held the position of a gentleman rather than that of a servant: "This is Ned Graham, the shepherd, to whom you remember sending medicines and comforts during his illness." The ladies bowed pleasantly, as Mr. Christmas continued, "He is now come to return your kindness with interest."

They looked at me with some surprise, principally, I think, because of the emphatic, distinct way in which the last few words were spoken. After a pause, the master said, "Amelia, Emily, I wish to speak to you a moment."

They all three left the room, while I, curious in such matters, looked at the open books that were lying on the table. One was "Ivanhoe," a second some French work, and that opposite the old gentleman's chair, a large family Bible.

In a few minutes I heard Mr. Christmas' step as he returned with two double-barrelled guns. There was a rigid expression on his face, very different to what I had ever seen there before—not the slightest evidence of faltering or fear.

"Are you cool, and a good shot?" were the first words he uttered.

"I am, sir," I replied confidently. "Are the guns loaded, and the ladies safe?"

"They are in as safe a position as I can find for them, Ned, and the guns are loaded with coarse shot and ball. You had better see if the powder is well up into the nipples. I am sorry to say my caps are none of the best. A shot missed may be death to us, and to those I value more than myself. However, we are in the hands of God."

"What plan do you purpose, Mr. Christmas?" I asked, earnestly.

"Take half a glass of brandy, and I will tell you."

He signed to the sideboard, where a decanter stood. I was about to follow his suggestion, when he said, "Stay! Don't pass between the light and the window. Go round the table. Everything must wear the appearance of peace. We cannot tell where they are now, and it would not do to arouse their suspicions."

In a few minutes the light was extinguished, the door was bolted, and we stepped quietly out on the little parterre in front.

"Now," said my master, slowly, "there are only our two selves to defend my home and my children. My servants are all absent at a bush fire that was reported this afternoon, and everything will depend upon our coolness and determination. We cannot do otherwise than shoot to kill. The gang will, of course, enter by the slip panels, for they will not run the risk of leaving their horses behind. Then, as the faintest noise can be heard on such a night as this, they will not hazard the pulling down of the fence. We will each take up a position behind the large posts, take sure aim, and fire low. I'll first first."

As silently as spectres, we walked across to the paddock entrance, and stood opposite each other at the place indicated. With straining eyes and beating heart, I peered into the obscurity. Alas, I thought I could see a faint tint on the sky, like the reflection of the ruffian's camp-fire. The night was terribly silent and oppressive. There was nothing apparently on which to exercise the senses but a kind of overpowering hush. There was a dim hazy curtain across the sky, and the night was of a black darkness. I should have thought oftentimes that I was dreaming, were it not for the patient, motionless figure opposite, and the faint stars. Inaction under such circumstances is hardly to be borne, and my thoughts often wandered, from their very intensity. I began to speculate how long it would take a star to pass some black ragged patch of cloud, and then I would look before me and see it dancing on the darkness. Then the face of Red Jim would grow upon me, till I saw the hideous features close to where I stood. Still, no sound broke on the dark shrouding night. Sometimes I thought, with a chilly start, that the bushrangers might have approached the house by some other way, but up behind me all was quiet.

At last there came a thin faint murmur that barely caught the air, and as I listened to know if it were real, I caught another but better defined noise that overpowered the first. At last I detected something that might be the footfalls of a horse; sometimes it would die away and come again, but each time more clearly than before. And yet I could not feel certain that I was not deceiving myself. Eventually I heard a muffled sound, distinct and defined enough to proclaim the approach of a horse, or horses.

Mr. Christmas heard it also, for I dimly saw him move. My hands felt along the cool barrels, and toyed with the hammers and triggers anxiously enough, and I put the gun to my shoulder against the sky, but failed to see the "view." Just as I had taken the weapon down again, Mr. Christmas said, in a clear low whisper, "Be sure you aim low, and don't be in a hurry."

As the sounds of the horses' hoofs, and of voices mingled, I detected the double click from the opposite gun. I followed the examples, and, with both guns cocked, we waited the enemy's near approach. Gradually, I recognized the outlines of the men against the sky, cloudy as it was; they were approaching in a single file, and as they became blacker and better defined, I heard a stifled laugh and an oath. In a short time they were within twenty yards of where we stood, and they pulled up to consult. Although they spoke in whispers, I heard much that passed, for my sense of hearing had become extremely acute, as that of all shepherds does. It was impossible to distinguish by the tones who the speakers were, but I heard one of them inquire:

"Are you sure the hands ain't above?"

"Sartin—when Leary spun his yarn about the fire, the cove sent 'em all to it."

"Hallelujah fust. If we fire the box, it'll bring 'em back."

"And no grabbing the molls," whispered one of them authoritatively, and whom I fancied was Red Jim, "till I make the cursed old psalm-singer a back log for the bonfire. Then we'll make love if you choose."

"Come on!" said an impatient voice: "don't hold a prayer meeting over it."

They then tied their horses to a fence that ran at right angles to the post against which I stood, and approached the entrance still in single file. I determined to adhere strictly to the orders I had received, and waited for the opposite fire. I knew that my companion would allow the men to advance a little, so that he might not endanger me; and it was with a throbbing heart that I saw the black form of the first bush-ranger pass between us.

I heard him stumble with an oath over a cart-rut. Then a line of flame cut its abrupt short track on the darkness, and the sound had not passed to echoes before a shrill cry followed it, as the villain staggered on a few paces and fell, ploughing up the dust. The light of the discharge had just died out, when I heard another snap, as a sportsman shoots when firing right and left. I knew that the master's gun was now useless.

"Come on Nix! It's the cove himself. I saw him by the light of the shot; his sting's gone now." And one of the men rushed to where my master stood, followed by his comrade.

I had one of them covered, but if I fired (I heard the noise of struggling,) I might kill my master. Thus I stood with the gun at aim, undecided and half mad. The voice of one of the men saying, "Damn you, knife him!" resolved me, and I fired amongst them. I saw some one sink down, but I could not tell who it was, and, as he appeared to let go his hold, and rush to the horses, I took a second hurried aim and fired; then I bounded across the entrance, just in time to see the wounded wretch bending over Mr. Christmas and trying to strangle him. In a moment the gun was poised and smashed to fragments on his skull. But we had exposed our strength, and the remaining bushranger, who believed he had stabbed my companion, seized one of the guns left standing at the fence, and fired. The ball was unpleasantly close, and had scarce time to know that I was uninjured, when Red Jim himself was upon me with the weapon clubbed. I made a rapid spring at him before the blow could fall, and grappled with him. We rolled on the ground together. With all the force of my strength I resisted his efforts to grasp me by the throat, but at last his hideous face sunk close to mine, and his teeth met beneath my chin. I experienced a suffocating giddy feeling, and then I heard hurried voices and running feet just as I felt my grip relax powerless. But the frightful grip relaxed too, and Red Jim rose to his feet and jumped on my chest with all his force.—When I came to consciousness, I found myself in the cheerful parlor, and the ladies' hands were tenderly washing away the traces of the fight. Mr. Christmas had fainted from loss of blood, but was not dangerously wounded.

Red Jim escaped, but his two companions, neither of whom were killed, were given into the safe keeping of the authorities, and afterwards hanged. Three years after the affray, Mr. Christmas made me his overseer, and finally his manager. A long time has passed since then, but yet a closer relationship exists between us. I am writing the tale of my early experiences at the same table whereon I saw the Bible on that memorable night. There is a lady who sits opposite to me. She was the reader of Ivanhoe, the daughter of Mr. Christmas, and she is my wife.

Fast Speakers.—A stenographer of the French Moniteur says that M. Dupin, the elder, is the fastest speaker in France; he speaks 24 lines of the Moniteur in a minute; M. Thiers speaks 22; M. Rouher between 18 and 20; M. Jules Favre 15; and M. Jules Simon 14. The reporter says it is excessively difficult to follow Messrs. Dupin and Theirs. It may be interesting in this connection to quote a passage from Gibbon's Autobiography: "As I was waiting in the manager's box, I had the curiosity to inquire of the short-hand writer, how many words a ready and rapid orator might pronounce in an hour? From 7,000 to 7,500, was his answer. The medium of 7,200 will afford 120 words in a minute. But this computation will only apply to this English language." Of a truth the average number of words in each line of the Moniteur is eight: this would make M. Dupin speak 192 words in a minute, M. Thiers 176, M. Rouher between 144 and 160, M. Jules Favre 120, and M. Jules Simon 112.

Frederick the Great wrote to one of his generals: "I send you with 60,000 men against the enemy." On numbering the troops, it was found there were but 50,000. The officer expressed his surprise at such a mistake on the part of his sovereign. Frederick's reply was: "I counted you for 10,000 men."

OUR LADY OF THE WRECKS.

A LEGEND OF THE PACIFIC.

MANY years ago, when the Pacific Coast was still under the proud dominion of Spain, and stately Spanish men-of-war were walking their watery beat from Mendocino to the Equator, there was in the service a stout ship called El Volturno, commanded by a sturdy old hidalgo named De Brezo.

The captain had formerly married an English woman, his junior by twenty years, whom he had met at Barcelona. The lady having bravely followed her husband to the West Indies, whither he had been ordered shortly after the marriage, paid the penalty of her rashness with her life, having fallen a victim to one of the terrible fevers common to the new country, leaving behind her a baby girl, whom the captain, with the assistance of a black woman of Jamaica, tried to bring up on shipboard, taking her with him on his various changes of duty.

The child was, at the time of which I write, about twelve years of age. She was more like an English child in her personal appearance, having blue eyes and flaxen hair like her mother. Indeed, she seemed out of place on board a Spanish frigate with its swarthy crew of weatherworn seamen. Her sensibilities and affections seemed, however, to have a touch of southern fire about them which made her, even at that age, impetuous and wilful. Her education was a grotesque one, if indeed that culture could be called education, which consisted in the main of wild stories told her by the rough sailors, of occasional lecturings by her ignorant foster-mother, and spasmodic attempts as a pedagogue on the part of her indulgent father. She was petted and spoiled on all hands; and very little control was exercised over her actions, beyond coaxings and caresses.

So she passed her days, hindering and amusing everybody, the only mutinous creature on board the otherwise solemn and orderly vessel. Now she would be swung aloft by some idle sailor, in imminent danger of a sea bath; now she would be over the side of the vessel, careless alike of the spray which dashed over her and the ejaculations showered upon her by her black nurse, who followed her around with a sort of human cluck of alarm over every new venturesome trick; and now her laughter would be heard from the maintop, whither her hoydenish spirit had led her.

Her father had foregone almost every species of remonstrance. Indeed, whenever he did essay reproof with her, she would climb lovingly over his broad shoulders, and, tugging at his grizzly whiskers, oblige him to cast aside his quarter deck dignity and work out a release from her caresses.

There was a young midshipman on board, a scion of some grandee family, who had been put under the care of the captain to learn navigation and make his first step on the ladder to admiralship. He was a delicate youth, fresh from tutors, and badly tinctured with the romance of Spanish fiction. His leisure hours were monopolized by Maria, who made him recount to her all the chivalrous legends which he had stolen time to read when at school at Salamanca. It was in the nature of things that the boy should begin to love his pretty listener; and it was also to be expected that he should adroitly turn the description of Don Guzman's passion for Donna Anna or Don Gonzaloo's for Elvira into a cunning menstruum to convey his own.

But Maria by no means lent herself to this plot of Henry's. Love in the abstract was pleasant enough for her to contemplate; but when the arrows were aimed at herself, she felt no ways comfortable. So, when he began to make things have a personal cast, and to look into her eyes beseechingly for favor as he knew was the custom with gallant cavaliers, she would push away his arm which she had allowed in friendship to steal around her little waist, get tired and yawn in his face, and then run off to the forecastle crowd, without so much as thanking him for his tale.

It was very improper on the part of the nurse and the captain to allow this familiarity; but the captain laughed when he heard about Henry's rebuffs, and bade him keep his declarations until he got home to Spain, when he would be old enough and tall enough to woo successfully more beautiful dames than ever Maria could be.

But Henry persisted, until at last Maria would have nothing to do with him; and one day, when she had crept down on the bowsprit rigging and found Henry following her thither, she forbade him, under pain of her displeasure, ever to address or annoy her when there. This weapon the little queen had learned to use from Henry's own tales of ladies who cruelly interdicted their troublesome lovers from entering their presence. Henry obeyed, and went back, half crying, to his trigonometry and maps, while Maria now formed the habit of sitting, when the weather was calm enough, there below the prow, gazing at the water and inventing little tales like Henry's for her own amusement.

She had been told by the seamen of beings who were somewhat human, and who lived in and about the sea. Indeed, Henry had confirmed their existence with whatever classical lore he possessed, and she fancied at times, as the vessel passed some rocky headland, that she could hear them shout far above the dash of the surf or the wind whistling through the rigging, though possibly it was only a moaning seal. Then, too, as she bent in her romantic reveries over the swaying, dashing brine at her feet, she fancied that she recognized two fiery eyes looking up at her from the flood, and floating locks, long and shaggy, tossed to and fro on the crest of the wave. But it was probably nothing but phosphorescence in the water, with only now and then a play of shadows made by the knots of rigging through which at times the sun shone. Still Maria gazed and believed in the watery apparition until she grew fascinated by her own credulity. She never dared to speak to the being who lay conscious at her feet; she was even afraid, and when the sun was sinking in the water, she would hasten up into the ship, trembling with some vague terror, not daring to look over her shoulder, and scarcely at ease even when nestling in the captain's cabin. At night, she would dream of great shaggy monsters, who talked to her in terrible tones and threatened indescribable terrors.

One evening, in her haste to get to the cabin before dark, she thought her foot slipped and that she fell into the water from her seat among the huge chains, and was just sinking, when some power lifted her up and placed her lightly back in a safer holding-place. She half fancied that she felt a brine-dripping beard upon her cheek and a human breath on her neck, while a strong grasp held her poised until she could regain her footing. It may have been. But it is more natural to suppose that the cap of some wave struck her and flung seaweed about her face, while the shaken chains had touched her and given rise to her fancy that hands had snatched her out of the water. For days thereafter she did not venture into that part of the ship; but sat silently in the cabin, not speaking to any one. The hale old captain missed her playfulness, and tried to arouse her. He set her on his knee and then flung her upon his shoulder; but though she tried to be gay, she could not, still thinking, as she was, of the quaint old monster who saved her life with such mysterious taciturnity. By-and-by, she outgrew her terrors and clambered down again to her old place. It was long before she dared to look directly at the water; but finally, little by little, she rested her gaze on the place where the eyes were wont to gleam. There they shone through the water, looking wistfully up to her with the same entreating expression which she had slighted when it beamed from poor Henry's. She imagined that a form was rising through the water, and screamed in terror. Her nurse was watching her from above, and, hearing her cry, asked the reason. Maria pointed to the place where the monster appeared, but the negress saw nothing but an undulating wave, which swept smoothly under the prow. Though the child watched all day, the being did not return again.

The next day, early in the morning, while the nurse was busy, and the sailors could not take notice of her, she was again swinging among the chains, overcome with the strange fascination of her sea acquaintance. She resolved that whatever happened she would make no alarm, but would find out what the merman wanted, deeming that he would do her no harm, insomuch as he had already once saved her life. After sitting but a few minutes, she saw the old fiery earnest eyes again, and presently the water broke above them, and a shaggy head appeared, set upon a pair of broad shoulders that seemed cushioned with huge epaulettes of grizzly hair. Maria was terrified beyond the power of utterance, and would again have fallen into the water if the monster had not stretched forth his arm and steadied her in her place. He then addressed her in a low gentle tone that seemed as musical as the waves beating against the ship. There was something so human about him that Maria, who had learned to know good people among the sailors, even under any amount of ugliness, began to be less afraid of him, and finally her childish confidence broke forth in questions about his curious appearance and way of living. She even got off the little speech of thanks to him for having saved her life; but he made no reply, and only asked her why she had staid away so long from her customary seat. Poor little Maria grew confused; she did not wish to tell him she had been frightened by him. Just then Henry called to her from above, "What are you murmuring about, Maria, all alone there by yourself?" Her new friend looked up at him sharply, and sank immediately into the water. Maria climbed up, and as she had not talked pleasantly to Henry for some time, she felt guilty, and putting her arms around his neck, she kissed him to make it up. Just then, she heard the angry swash of a wave at a little distance from the ship. It startled her, but Henry remarked that it was nothing but a porpoise, and danced her away to the cabin, where her father jested Henry about his success in wooing.

The next day, Maria awaited another interview with the merman. He was a little taciturn in his conversation. However, her clear frankness soon melted him into better nature, and he told her of his relations who lived like him in the sea; how they never grew any older, but spent their lives floating about, keeping watch over all the fishes of the sea; and mak-iug rnles for their guidance. He said that it was his business to rule everything in the water, just as it was man's to govern on land. He told her strange things about the deeps of the ocean, of coral palaces, of castles surrounded by groves of sea trees, and covered with marine foliage. He was talking to her so, and she was all excitement, when she felt two hands over her eyes, and Henry who had clambered down beside her, in spite of her former injunction, shouted laughingly: "There you are talkiug to the water again:" for he did not see the shaggy mouster, but ouly a dark seaweed-covered wave swelling around the bow. Just then Henry was called by the c'ptuin. He snatched a kiss from Marin, and rushed back to his duty. In the meanwhile the monster had sunk, but reappeared when she was agaiu alone. This tune, he commenced to question the child crossly about Henry. "Who was he? What was his business with her? Did he love her? Did she love him?" At this last question Maria was confused. She finally said that she did. The monster grew positively terrible at this confession. Henry, who was impudent enough to seek her company again, came to the side of the vessel, and in climbing over, missed his hold and fell into the sea. At this, the monster grew furious, and lashing the waves with his limbs, seized the poor boy, and was sinking with him when catching a sight of Maria's bloodless and horror-expressing countenance, he rose again, and threw the drowning boy towards her. She seized Henry and dragged him into safety; while the merman said coldly, "You can have him. I love you too well to be revengeful." At this she blushed, and Henry thanked her for having saved his life, which, as he thought, was in danger from some eddying wave, while the dangerous rival floated out of sight.

The peril which Henry had undergone made Maria become very grave. She began to be reticeut in her interviews with her sea friend, and her moods of silence extended over her relations with every one on the ship. The seamen even began to notice it and whisper wonderingly about it with each other. One superstitious old tar, surprising her one day talking to the water, half believed that she was bewitched, and it was not until he had seen her cross herself one day at prayers before the Virgin that the unworthy suspicion was dispelled. At last, her father took her changed manner to heart; and finally he commanded her not to sit at the bow any more; noticing as he did the effect that her reveries there had npon her. She coaxed and wheedled him to overcome his objections; but the more she evinced her wish, the stronger grew his opposition. At last, fearful lest he might discover her secret acquaintance, the merman having shown a terrible repugnance to being known by others, she yielded. That night she did not go out of the cabin. The next night passed, aud she still secluded herself. The next night, a terrible storm arose; the sails were blown to shreds, while the huge rudder by some mysterious action of the waves was wrenched away, aud the ship, powerless in the hands of the sailors, began to drift slowly towards a rocky promontory that loomed up in the darkness. There was something so strange abont the storm, its suddenness and the unusual occurrence of a tempest at that time and in that part of the sea, that the superstitious sailors were rendered incapable of action, nnd heedless of the captain's orders, fell to praying and weeping. Mnria awoke to find every one despairing of life. She rushed to the bow, and, unmindful of every one else, cried to the mighty mouster below to save the vessel. Either the waves about the vessel took such queer shapes that his eyes were deceived, or his mind predisposed already by terror and ignorance worked out the odd fancy; but the superstitious sailor, who had suspected Maria of witchcraft declared afterwards that as she stood there in her floating night dress and talked to the water, there gathered up arouud the sides of the vessel a herd of strange uncanny creatures, who glared wildly at the praying crew, and theu sank into the flood. However incredible his story may be, and certainly no faith could be attached to so improbable a statement, it is certain that the ship drifted no longer towards the rocks, but appeared to right herself and oppose the storm with more power than it would seem possible in her wrecked condition for her to manifest. The sailors afterwards declared that all night long, strange voices were heard as if proceeding from the water; nnd when morning came, they found themselves near a well known harbor, into which they worked the vessel, and made ready to repair her losses.

The captain allowed Mnria to wander along the shore; and she was thus enabled to have many interviews with her marine lover, of whom she had no little amount of awe; but over whom she was half pleased to find herself exercising so potent an influence.

The sailors, however, thanks to the superstitious tar, who caught her addressing entreaties to the waves, began to fear and avoid her. Their impressions finally reached the captain's ears, and he foresaw that her further stay on the ship would be unpleasant. Ho had long been projecting a returu to Spain. He was now old. His child stood in nced of oversight necessary to instruct her in the duties of her rank, and a few years of convent education were part of his plan for her.

Accordingly, he disclosed to her his purposes, and having arranged his retirement from the service, he took passage down the coast for the Isthmus. On the new vessel, Maria continued her old reveries with more facility from the fact that she was a stranger to the sailors. She told her lover of their coming separation, and promised him that when she could, she would return, and build herself a house among the rocks where they had had so many meetings, and that he might always be able to see her. He was not well satisfied with the arraugement; but innsmuch as he was imperatively obliged by the laws of his race to disclose himself to more than one human being, he submitted with uo small amount of misgivings. Maria now really loved him. He was as chivalrous as the most renowned knight of Henry's tales could have beeu. He was rough and shaggy, not by any means a fit creature for a young Spanish lady to adore, but he was powerful, gentle, and yielding. So she overlooked all his wild defects, and saw her happiness only in being placed where she could always enjoy his presence.

At last they were obliged to part. With many secret fears Maria saw him float off, after she hnd bidden him adieu, and was looking down upon the bay, ready to enter upon her land journey to the Atlantic. The weary voyage was finally completed, and she nnd her nurse were placed in a retired convent near Madrid.

There she began her studies. She was taught many precepts by the sisterhood, became nn adept in embroidery, learned many Latiu chants, and occasionally a love song.

At this time Henry, who had returned to Spain, was permitted to pay her a visit. As usual, his conversation was about love, and very warm were his asseverations as to his devotion to her. But she very soon discovered that she was not alone in his regards, aud many were the tales he artlessly disclosed of beautiful dames he had met at court, who, he confessed, were neither as cold nor as beautiful as herself. Maria was no longer afraid ol his gallantry; but she quizzed him slily about his fickleness, and bade him always rely upon what her English relatives would call her friendship.

Still, when love was talked, and a couveut by uo means shuts off such subjects of discussion, Maria's thoughts would take a long jonrney to her Pacific experiences, and in her dreams she would see the rushing waters about the ship, the fiery eyes gazing tenderly up at her, and hear the rippling tide as her strange lover would rise through it to meet her. She began to get sick of the unchanging land. Her reading consisted of the old voyages of the early Spanish navigators, wherein the convent librnry had by some chance been well stocked, and the superstitions of the sea were her romances. She would sit for hours with some old seaman's chronicle before her, with the thought of her loved monster working in her brain. She begnn to grow pale and thin; the good sisters spent many mouths in trying to divine and remove her ailing; but though she showed herself to be nffectionate towards all; and though every little attention bestowed upou her called forth a thankful smile, yet her cheek grew thinner and thinuer, and her strength was fast abating. At last a fever came. She began to wander in her talk, and to believe that she was back agaiu in the Pacific, with the rough mariners arouud her; now she would laugh as though frolicking with Henry, now she would call merrily after her father, and now fling her arms around her old black nurse, as she was wont to do wheu she wished to nnticipate a scolding. Again her mood would change, and she would talk in a way nobody could understand to some one whom none knew.

She would at times beseech to be takeu back to the old vessel, crying out thnt the air was too close and warm. One night, to please her, they opened the windows to the breeze, and brought her couch to where she could look out upon a grove of oranges. At that moment a flock of sea birds came fluttering into the grove nnd settled about the garden. It was a great marvel to every one, as birds of that character had uever been known to venture so far inlnnd. At the sound of their twitterings, Maria grew excited. "Take me back!" she cried; "I must see him again. He is waiting for me. Take me to the ship."

They told her father of her strange sick whim. He was no whit less yielding to her now than he had been when she danced upou his knee and twisted his beard. So he twisted the beard himself now, and after swearing a round of good Spanish, seamanlike oaths, which the pious sisters kindly interpreted as prayers, he declared thnt she should go back, and he with her, and that they should live on shipboard, or on the coast of the Pacific, nnywhere she wished.

She seemed to grow better when told of the projected voyage. The fever seemed almost to leave her under the cool touch of the sea air. She never complained or was restive during all the long voyage; but cheered her nurse with a feigned show of strength and liveliness, and talked to her father with a gleam of the old merriment in her eyes. At last they reached the new country, and she was carried by the natives in a sort of sedan the remainder of the journey.

But every mile she was carried seemed to have kept a moiety of her life, and at last, when they came within sound of the great Pacific, they found that she was dying. She still managed to thank her father and nurse for their devotion to her happiness, and told them that she was indeed happy, since she could now die where she had known so much pleasure.

They carried her down to the sea-side, nnd she mustered strength enough to sit up and watch the water below her. There was no breeze, and the bay which they overlooked seemed perfectly still. Suddenly, afar off, there appeared a ripple on the surface, which grew to a huge wave as it came nearer shore. Maria watched it intently. At last she started up and cried, "There he comes! I knew he would watch for me!" She held up her handkerchief and waved it feebly, and then fell back lifeless into her father's arms. The strange wave, which until then had seemed to roll towards land, now retreated into the ocean. The nurse, who was disposed, as all superstitious people are, to attach importance to the delirious accents of the dying, affirmed afterwards that she saw distinctly a great dark form under the wave; but the Captain said that it was nothing more than Maria's childish habit, which he had long known, to claim familiar acquaintance with everything that lived in the sea.

They buried her on a slope of the coast, where the ocean's thunder could always be heard; and, to mark the grave, they placed over it an old figurehead that they had found on the shore, representing the Virgin; and no Spanish vessel ever passes that spot but every sailor makes a prayer to "Our Lady of the Wrecks" to watch over him on his voyage.

The Spanish legends have it, that a strange half human being still haunts that coast; that whenever a ship passes he lifts his shaggy head from the waters, and gazes wistfully at the decks, as if in search of some one who should be there.

NURSERY RHYMES.

ADAPTED TO THE TASTES OF CALIFORNIA CHILDREN.

THERE was an young girl of Milpitis
Who had an attack of bronchitis;
She said: "Why, I 'd cough
My infernal head off,
If I stayed two days more in Milpitis."

THERE was an old chap of Gold Hill
Who had his foot crushed in a mill,
When he cried out, "Enough!"
And remarked: "This is rough
On an old pioneer of Gold Hill."

THERE was a young woman of Folsom
Who was told that much pork was unwholesome;
She said: "I shall bust
That relative's crust,
Who tells me that pork is unwholesome!"

THERE was an young girl of Grass Valley
Who once made this humorous sally—
She said: "Go to grass—"
And when folks said "Alas!"
She remarked—"I intended 'Grass—Valley.'"

THERE was a young girl of Sonora
Who was asked by her fondest adorer
If she 'd be his wife;
She replied: "Bet your life!
That's me—count me in—ring-tail roarer."

THERE was a small child at Dutch Flat
Who played thimble-rig in his hat;
He said: "Just look here,
I'm a gay gambolier"—
That festive young child of Dutch Flat.

THERE was a soft youth at Knight's Ferry
Whose manners were innocent, very;
He always turned Jack
From the top of the pack—
A method unknown at Knight's Ferry.

THERE was a young girl of Martinez
Who said: "So disgustingly mean is
This half-Spanish town
I wish it was down
In the depths of the straits of Carquinez."

WODE.

IT is a popular fallacy that "A pound of lead is as heavy as a pound of feathers."

Some wiseacre will exclaim, as he reads the above statement, "Surely the printer or the author has made a big blunder;" but we here take occasion to say to such wiseacre: A pound of lead—in the sense you attach to that expression—is not as heavy as a pound of feathers, attaching to the latter expression your own and the popular significance. Do you wish for proof? You shall have it.

Any body weighed in air loses in weight as much as the weight of the air which it displaces. A pound of feathers, being more bulky than a pound of lead, loses more, or is buoyed up more by the surrounding air. If you were to weigh out on the most delicate scale a pound of feathers, and then balance them by lead, and afterwards observe the whole under the exhausted receiver of an air-pump, where no air could affect either, you would find the lead kick the beam. In like manner, it is undeniable that a ton of hay is heavier than a ton of iron. Neither is the difference so trifling as to be inappreciable. It will be easy to make an approximate estimate thereof. One hundred cubic inches of air at 60 deg. of Fahrenheit, barometer 30 inches, weigh 31 grains; or 13 cubic feet of air, weigh 1 lb. A ton of hay, as ordinarily put up in bales here, of eight or nine to the ton, contains from 160 to 170 cubic feet, and consequently loses, when weighed in air, from 12 to 13 lbs. Now a ton of iron would scarcely occupy a space of thirteen cubic feet, and consequently, in point of strict scientific truth, a ton of iron is ten or twelve lbs. lighter than a ton of hay.

THE FACTS

CONCERNING THE RECENT TROUBLE BETWEEN MR. MARK TWAIN AND MR. JOHN WILLIAM SKAE, OF VIRGINIA CITY—WHEREIN IT IS ATTEMPTED TO BE PROVED THAT THE FORMER WAS NOT TO BLAME IN THE MATTER.

Mysterious.—Our esteemed friend, Mr. John William Skae, of Virginia City, walked into our office at a late hour last night with an expression of profound and heartfelt suffering upon his countenance, and sighing heavily, laid the following item reverently upon the desk and walked slowly out again. He paused a moment at the door and seemed struggling to command his feelings sufficiently to enable him to speak, and then, nodding his head toward his manuscript, ejaculated in a broken voice, "Friend of mine—Oh how sad!" and burst into tears. We were so moved at his distress that we did not think to call him back and endeavor to comfort him until he was gone and it was too late. Our paper had already gone to press, but knowing that our friend would consider the publication of this item important, and cherishing the hope that to print it would afford a melancholy satisfaction to his sorrowing heart, we stopped the press at once and inserted it in our columns:

Distressing Accident.—Last evening about 6 o'clock, as Mr. William Schuyler, an old and respectable citizen of South Park, was leaving his residence to go down town, as has been his usual custom for many years, with the exception only of a short interval in the Spring of 1850 during which he was confined to his bed by injuries received in attempting to stop a runaway horse by thoughtlessly placing himself directly in its wake and throwing up his hands and shouting, which, if he had done so even a single moment sooner must inevitably have frightened the animal still more instead of checking its speed, although disastrous enough to himself as it was, and rendered more melancholy and distressing by reason of the presence of his wife's mother, who was there and saw the sad occurrence, notwithstanding it is at least likely, though not necessarily so, that she should be reconnoitering in another direction when incidents occur, not being vivacious and on the lookout, as a general thing, but even the reverse, as her own mother is said to have stated, who is no more, but died in the full hope of a glorious resurrection, upwards of three years ago, aged 86, being a Christian woman and without guile, as it were, or property, in consequence of the fire of 1849, which destroyed every blasted thing she had in the world. But such is life. Let us all take warning by this solemn occurrence, and let us endeavor so to conduct ourselves that when we come to die we can do it. Let us place our hands upon our hearts and say with earnestness and sincerity that from this day forth we will beware of the intoxicating bowl.—First Edition of the Californian.

(SECOND EDITION OF THE CALIFORNIAN.)

THE boss-editor has been in here raising the very mischief, and tearing his hair and kicking the furniture about, and abusing me like a pick-pocket. He says that every time he leaves me in charge of the paper for half an hour I get imposed upon by the first infant or the first idiot that comes along. And he says that distressing item of Johnny Skae's is nothing but a lot of distressing bosh, and has got no point to it, and no sense in it, and no information in it, and that there was no earthly necessity for stopping the press to publish it. He says every man he meets has insinuated that somebody about THE CALIFORNIAN office has gone crazy.

Now all this comes of being good-hearted. If I had been as unaccommodating and unsympathetic as some people, I would have told Johnny Skae that I wouldn't receive his communication at such a late hour, and to go to blazes with it—but no, his snuffling distress touched my heart, and I jumped at the chance of doing something to modify his misery. I never read his item to see whether there was anything wrong about it, but hastily wrote the few lines which preceded it and sent it to the printers. And what has my kindness done for me? It has done nothing but bring down upon me a storm of abuse and ornamental blasphemy.

Now I will just read that item myself, and see if there is any foundation for all this fuss. And if there is, the author of it shall hear from me.

* * * * * * *

I have read it, and I am bound to admit that it seems a little mixed at a first glance. However, I will peruse it once more.

* * * * * * *

I have read it again, and it does really seem a good deal more mixed than ever.

* * * * * * *

I have read it over five times, but if I can get at the meaning of it, I wish I may get my just deserts. It won't bear analysis. There are things about it which I cannot understand at all. It don't say what ever became of William Schuyler. It just says enough about him to get one interested in his career, and then drops him. Who is William Schuyler, anyhow, and what part of South Park did he live in? and if he started down town at six o'clock, did he ever get there? and if he did, did anything happen to him? is he the individual that met with the "distressing accident?" Considering the elaborate circumstantiality of detail observable in the item, it seems to me that it ought to contain more information than it does. On the contrary, it is obscure—and not only obscure but utterly incomprehensible. Was the breaking of Mr. Schuyler's leg fifteen years ago the "distressing accident" that plunged Mr. Skae into unspeakable grief, and caused him to come up here at dead of night and stop our press to acquaint the world with the unfortunate circumstance? Or did the "distressing accident" consist in the destruction of Schuyler's mother-in-law's property in early times? or did it consist in the death of that person herself 3 years ago, (albeit it does not appear that she died by accident?) In a word, what did that "distressing accident" consist in? What did that driveling ass of a Schuyler stand in the wake of a runaway horse for, with his shouting and gesticulating, if he wanted to stop him? And how the mischief could he get run over by a horse that had already passed beyond him? And what are we to "take warning" by? and how is this extraordinary chapter of incomprehensibilities going to be a "lesson" to us? And above all, what has the "intoxicating bowl" got to do with it, anyhow? It is not stated that Schuyler drank, or that his wife drank, or that his mother-in-law drank, or that the horse drank—wherefore, then, the reference to the intoxicating bowl? It does seem to me that if Mr. Skae had let the intoxicating bowl alone himself, he never would have got into so much trouble about this infernal imaginary distressing accident. I have read his absurd item over and over again, with all its insinuating plausibility, until my head swims, but I can make neither head nor tail of it. There certainly seems to have been an accident of some kind or other, but it is impossible to determine what the nature of it was, or who was the sufferer by it. I do not like to do it, but I feel compelled to request that the next time anything happens to one of Mr. Skae's friends, he will append such explanatory notes to his account of it as will enable me to find out what sort of an accident it was and who it happened to. I had rather all his friends should die than that I should be driven to the verge of lunacy again in trying to cipher out the meaning of another such production as the above.

But now, after all this fuss that has been made by the chief cook about this item, I do not see that it is any more obscure than the general run of local items in the daily papers after all. You don't usually find out much by reading local items, and you don't in the case of Johnny Skae's item. But it is just THE CALIFORNIAN'S style to be so disgustingly particular and so distressingly hypercritical. If Stiggers throws off one of his graceful little jokes, ten to one THE CALIFORNIAN will come out the very next Saturday and find fault with it, because there ain't any point to it—find fault with it because there is no place in it where you can laugh—find fault with it because a man feels humiliated after reading it. They don't appear to know how to discriminate. They don't appear to understand that there are different kinds of jokes, and that Stiggers' jokes may be of that kind. No; they give a man no credit for originality—for striking out into new paths and opening up new domains of humor; they overlook all that, and just cramp an Alta joke down to their own narrow and illiberal notion of what a joke ought to be, and then if they find it hasn't got any point to it, they turn up their noses and say it isn't any joke at all. I do despise such meanness.

And they are just the same way with the Flag's poetry. They never stop to reflect that the author may be striking out into new fields of poetry—no; they simply say, "Stuff! this poem's got no sense in it; and it hasn't got any rhyme to it to speak of; and there is no more rhythm about it than there is to a Chinese oration"—and then, just on this evidence alone, they presume to say it's not poetry at all.

And so with the Call's grammar. If the local of the Call gets to branching out into new and aggravating combinations of words and phrases, they don't stop to think that maybe he is humbly trying to start something fresh in English composition and thus make his productions more curious and entertaining—not they: they just bite into him at once, and say he isn't writing grammar. And why? We repeat: And why? Why, merely because he don't choose to be the slave of their notious and Murray's.

And just so with the Bulletin's country correspondents. Because one of those mild and unoffending dry-goods clerks with his hair parted in the middle writes down to the Bulletin in a column and a half how he took the stage for Calistoga; and paid his fare; and got his change; stating the amount of the same; and that he had thought it would be more; but unpretentiously intimates that it could be a matter of no consequence to him one way or the other; and then goes on to tell about who he found at the Springs; and who he treated; and who treated him; and proceeds to give the initials of all the ladies of quality sojourning there; and does it in such a way as to conceal, as far as possible, how much they dote on his society; and then tells how he took a bath; and how the soap escaped from his fingers; and describes with infinite humor the splashing and scrambling he had to go through with before he got it again; and tells how he took a breezy gallop in the early morning at 9 A. M. with Gen. E. B. G.'s charming and accomplished daughter, and how the two, with souls o'ercharged with emotions too deep for utterance, beheld the glorious sun bathing the eastern hills with the brilliant magnificence of his truly gorgeous splendor, thus recalling to them tearful reminiscences of other scenes and other climes, when their hearts were young and as yet unseared by the cold clammy hand of the vain, heartless world—dreaming thus, in blissful unconsciousness, he of the stream of ants travelling up his body and down the back of his neck, and she of the gallinipper sucking the tip-end of her nose—because one of these inoffensive pleasure-going correspondents writes all this to the Bulletin, I say, THE CALIFORNIAN gets irritated and acrimonious in a moment, and says it is the vilest bosh in the world; and says there is nothing important about it, and wonders who in the nation cares if that fellow did ride in the stage, and pay his fare, and take a bath, and see the sun rise up and slobber over the eastern hills four hours after daylight; and asks with withering scorn, "Well, what does it all amount to?" and wants to know who is any wiser now than he was before he read the long winded correspondence; and intimates that the Bulletin had better be minding the commercial interests of the land than afflicting the public with such wishy-washy trash. That is just the style of THE CALIFORNIAN. No correspondence is good enough for its hypercritical notions unless it has got something in it. The CALIFORNIAN sharps don't stop to consider that maybe that disbanded clerk was up to something—that maybe he was sifting around after some new realm or other in literature—that maybe perhaps he was trying to get something through his head—well, they don't stop to consider anything; they just say, because it is trivial, and awkwardly written, and stupid, and devoid of information, that it is Bosh, and that is the end of it! THE CALIFORNIAN hates originality—that is the whole thing in a nutshell. They know it all. They are the only authority—and if they don't like a thing, why of course it won't do. Certainly not. Now who but THE CALIFORNIAN would ever have found fault with Johnny Skae's item. No daily paper in town would, anyhow. It is after the same style, and is just as good, and as interesting and as luminous as the articles published every day in the city papers. It has got all the virtues that distinguish those articles and render them so acceptable to the public. It is not obtrusively pointed, and in this it resembles the jokes of Stiggers; it warbles smoothly and easily along, without rhyme or rythm or reason, like the Flag's poetry; the eccentricity of its construction is appalling to the grammatical student, and in this it rivals the happiest achievements of the Call; it furnishes the most laborious and elaborate details to the eye without transmitting any information whatever to the understanding, and in this respect it will bear comparison with the most notable specimens of the Bulletin's country correspondence; and finally, the mysterious obscurity that curtains its general intent and meaning could not be surpassed by all the newspapers in town put together.

(THIRD EDITION OF THE CALIFORNIAN.)

More trouble. The chief hair-splitter has been in here again raising a dust. It appears that Skae's item has disseminated the conviction that there has been a distressing accident somewhere, of some kind or other, and the people are exasperated at the agonizing uncertainty of the thing. Some have it that the accident happened to Schuyler; others say that inasmuch as Schuyler disappeared in the first clause of the item, it must have been the horse; again, others say that inasmuch as the horse disappeared in the second clause without having up to that time sustained any damage, it must have been Schuyler's wife; but others say that inasmuch as she disappeared in the third clause all right and was never mentioned again, it must have been the old woman, Schuyler's mother-in-law; still others say that inasmuch as the old woman died three years ago, and not necessarily by accident, it is too late in the day to mention it now, and so it must have been the house; but others sneer at the latter idea, and say if the burning of the house sixteen years ago was so "distressing" to Schuyler, why didn't he wait fifty years longer before publishing the incident, and then maybe he could bear it easier. But there is trouble abroad, at any rate. People are satisfied that there has been an accident, and they are furious because they cannot find out who it has happened to. They are ridiculously unreasonable. They say they don't know who Schuyler is, but that's neither here nor there—if anything has happened to him they are going to know all about it or somebody has got to suffer.

That is just what it has come to—personal violence. And it is all bred out of that snivelling lunatic's coming in here at midnight, and enlisting my sympathies with his infamous imaginary misfortune, and making me publish his wool-gathering nonsense. But this is throwing away time. Something has got to be done. There has got to be an accident in the Schuyler family, and that without any unnecessary delay. Nothing else will satisfy the public. I don't know any man by the name of Schuyler, but I will go out and hunt for one. All I want now is a Schuyler. And I am bound to have a Schuyler if I have to take Schuyler Colfax. If I can only get hold of a Schuyler, I will take care of the balance of the programme—I will see that an accident happens to him as soon as possible. And failing this, I will try and furnish a disaster to the stricken Skae.

MARK TWAIN.

A BIT OF ANGLING.

I FISH. The reason is, I like it. There is great joy for me in this fine sport. My rod and I are the best of friends. Having for many years been trained and educated in all the angler's arts, I look upon myself as equal to the proper bringing up of any of the finny family.

One afternoon last Summer I enticed trout from a brook that ran and revelled along a cool Franconia valley. A mossy cushion mitigated the asperities of the rock on which I reclined, and I was happy. A canopy of waving branches overhead shut off the fiercest beams of the sun, while softer rays, trickling through the foliage, diffused a tender warmth around, the delicate perfume of forest flowers filled the air, and the music of the rippling waters echoed ceaselessly. Beside me lay an ample basket, half filled with speckled luxuries. Before me was the prospect of its speedy repletion.

The trembling undulations of my line announced another victim. A breathless moment of suspense, a few skilful allurements, a bit of scientific fascination, and the sharp hook, entering his innocent gill, whirled him quivering through the air, to my ready hand.

Rustling twigs and footsteps crushing the dry leaves distracted my attention. The boughs parted, and my seclusion was disturbed by a lovely apparition. Indistinct notions of white flowing robes, a pinkish shawl, shiny slippers afflictingly diminutive, a jaunty wide hat of the order known as flats, and other appurtenances of feminine attractiveness, came upon me; but I was mainly absorbed by two lustrous eyes, extravagantly distended with horror as they rested upon the struggling captive from whose lacerated nose I extracted steel.

It was sweet seventy-six that stood and gazed. I thus numerically designate her, not from any knowledge that I possessed of her age, which I hasten to announce as apparently eighteen, or seventeen plus, but because at that early period I was able to distinguish her only by the number of her room in the hotel, the second floor of which we both inhabited. Her door was opposite mine, and open at most times; and every morning for a week I had taken in her image with my boots, and cherished it.

Circumstances had not entitled me to advance a claim upon her attention. Our relations had been rigidly formal. I had, one unlucky evening, stepped upon her dress, and made a hole it, but I did not consider this a suitable opening for intimacy between us. Twice at table I had enjoyed opportunities of offering her mustard, but I could not bring myself to look upon mustard as the proper medium through which to establish a durable acquaintance with so exquisite a being. If it had been the cream, or honey, or even pudding, the case would have been different; but mustard lacked delicacy, and I recoiled from its intercession. And now, unlooked-for chance had brought us strangely together. Releasing herself from the enthralment of the augmented eyes, I rose and, courteously, I think, explained my occupation.

"Dear me," said she, "how horrible!"

That is just what she said. Sweet seventy-six said it was horrible. I thought this sort of beginning inauspicious, but I believed the point susceptible of argument, and ventured a contrary opinion.

"Oh, it is horrible," she persisted; "how can you bear to do it? So cruel, so heartless; poor little dears, all shiny and speckled, too," and she bent over the basket, much moved.

"Excuse me, how can you say so? People will eat trout; you eat them yourself; I think you breakfasted with two and a half this morning. Now if trout were not caught, trout could not be eaten. Therefore trout must be caught. Else how could you breakfast?"

This elaborate reasoning was ineffectual. Pity for suffering nature had overflowed this tender little heart, and left no room for logic any where about her. A series of compassionate remonstrances assailed me. How could I resist them? I, too, began to look upon myself in the light of a barbarian, and admitted disagreeable doubts respective of my recent sport.

"Oh, pray," concluded sweet seventy-six, "pray don't do it any more! I think I never can eat fish again. I didn't know it was so dreadful. Please, sir, give it up. Be merciful!"

Of course there was no denying such appeals, and so I promised, and ruefully gave over. One gleam of satisfaction alleviated my regrets. Conventional ice was broken, and we floated upon the waves of comparative familiarity.

At tea that evening smoking pyramids of savory trout rose before me. Sweet seventy-six's plate was near. I timidly dared to fill it. There was no remonstrance. She had, then, forgotten; but I shuddered to think of the consequences, should the recollection too suddenly break upon her.

"There," she exclaimed, flushed with a tardy consciousness, as she opened her fair lips to receive the last morsel that her plate afforded, "now if that should have been the poor darling that I saw you catch, sir. I wonder, now, if it was. Do you think it could have been, sir?"

"I believe it was," I answered gravely, and not without apprehensions.

"But how do you know?"

"I recognize it by the size," said I; "it was the largest of them all."

"Why, how nice! Do you know, now, I had no idea it could have been so nice. There is a great deal in cookery. I'll take another, if you please, sir."

I mused.

That this incident affected me unpleasantly, I will not attempt to conceal. I could not conceal it even then. It seemed as if fair seventy-six were not animated by that rectitude of sentiment which young women ought always to possess. In the matter of fish she appeared fickle. She was incapable of hardening herself against an appeal of appetite, though the original means of gratifying it were abhorrent to her. Reflecting thus, I went with her to the drawing-room.

We talked. Trout were referred to. With timid confusion she admitted her weakness, and spoke in slightly opprobrious terms regarding it. But on the question of the enormity of angling she remained obdurate. Then with feminine rapidity observing my concern, she deployed smiles and comforting murmurs, and playful agitations of curls, and other expressions of artful artlessness, known only to maidenhood, obliterating, as the evening faded, all thought of severity in my mind.

We walked a little on the piazza. I spoke, not coherently I am afraid, of the scenery and the lakes, and the mountain streams and the echoes, and undertook imbecile figures of speech, and occasionally obtruded feeble flatteries, suggested by the splendors of the firmament, and consequently moonshiny.

She gave me to know that her name was Laura. Something was said about a surname, which conventional forms required me to take note of. It was Larcher, and I thought it a bore.

When we parted, between our respective doors, she lighted her candle by mine, and beamed upon me with her eyes. The hot spermaceti fell upon my fingers, but I uttered no cry. She turned at last to go, and said in a manner that betokened final decision:

"Well, good-night; good-night!"

The next thing was, she came round upon me, and said she would shake hands, if I would promise sacredly never to massacre those sweet little fish any more.

What could a man do?

From that moment I resigned myself to infatuation. I caused my seat at table to be fixed beside Miss Larcher. At every regular meal I devoured her with my eyes. I avoided the woods and mountains, except when she chose to visit them, and cultivated brilliancy of boots and polish of manner. At the end of three days I was as inextricably fettered, metaphorically, as some time ago were Mars and Venus, by vulcanized process.

And yet I am fastidious. At least I think so. Experiences within a few short weeks had taught me to believe that I was very fastidious. I had been at Saratoga. My friend Dixford had shown me his sister and some attentions. I was attracted toward Miss Dixford. Her style of beauty was determined and imperious; black hair, dark eyes heavily shaded, implacable nose, and mouth delicately firm. I was at first rather awe-struck by her general regality, but in time we became fine friends, and I experienced devotion toward her. We rode together incessantly for two days, regardless of the dust and the comments of society. We had souls above both. On the third morning I gave a violent proof of my interest in her. I rose before the customary hour for breakfast to join her in an early ramble. We approached the springs, hitherto an untravelled region for me. Miss Dixford called for water. She handed me a glass. By unwonted exercise of fortitude I gradually absorbed the fraction of a gill. Before I had accomplished this, Miss Dixford had introduced the entire contents of her glass into her system, and had called for more.

To record the details would be to occasion myself unnecessary pain. The remembrance is odious Five distinct successive draughts, large draughts, five large goblets full, that resolute young lady disposed of. I stood aghast.

"Come," she said, in a voice which seemed to bubble up from some troubled deep, "come, let us go back."

"Certainly," said I, "by all means."

"You do not like the waters, I am afraid," she said, in tones still moist and effervescent.

"Not to drink," said I, gloomily.

"Dear me," said she, "I adore them. I am not up to my ordinary mark this morning," she added, with a bibulous sort of smile; "I shall have no appetite all day."

"Oh," said I, faintly, "not up to the ordinary mark?"

"No," she answered, "I usually take seven. I have taken eight." (Here a burst of heroic pride.)

"I admire your courage, Miss Dixford. I think you are a Joan of Arc, so far as conquering delicate and sensitive instinct goes."

Miss Dixford was pleased at the compliment, and appeared to regret that she had not given better ground for it by straining a point and achieving a few extra glasses that morning.

The same day I left Saratoga. I did not consider that it was proper for me to become the satellite of a luminary whose lustre was liable at any time to be quenched by excessive medicinal fluid. I could not reconcile myself to the idea of intimacy with a young lady who made a daily cataract of her esophagus. For myself, I resolved to look at once for waters of oblivion, which I could hardly hope to find near Congress Hall. As I was about starting, Dixford came to me.

"Why do you go so unexpectedly?" he asked.

"The truth is, my dear fellow," said I, "there is no fishing. It is charming here, in every respect, except that it is hot, and the roads are dusty— Well, never mind; but there is no profitable fishing. I must have fishing. I must have fishing. I am going to Newport."

"We shall be sorry. Julia will be sorry. She was pleased with you, and for her to be pleased—that is something. How do you like my sister, Plimkins?"

"She is most amiable, and I respect very much her decision and dauntlessness, if I may say so."

"Ah, there's where her strength lies," said Dixford. "Intellectually she is strong. She astonishes me, sometimes, in that direction."

"She does astoish one, sometimes," I said.

"Oh yes," said he, "she will do something yet. I think it will be Greek, or geometry. She has much to learn she says, to reach her own ideal standard, but she will reach it. Her receptive faculties are very great. Perhaps you have noticed that."

"Very," said I.

I went up to Newport. The second morning after my arrival (I pass over all inferior incidents,) a medieval lady of good-natured mien begged my pardon and asked if I were a Plimkins of Boston. Learning that I was, she furthermore hoped I would excuse her, and was curious to know if my mother had been a Rydwell. The bit of curiosity having been affirmatively assuaged, the good-natured lady claimed me as a friend, on the strength of her former boarding-school affection for my mother, whom she had not seen for forty years, and presented me to her daughter, in whom I took immediate satisfaction.

Lina Pinkerby afforded a thorough contrast to the dark lady whose picture had recently been washed from my breast by five glasses of Congress water. She was fair, and full of daintiest drawing-room refinement. Her liquid eyes seemed calculated to furnish the oblivious element I needed; and I could not help anchoring my regard in them.

The weather, which blustered much about this time, produced such peculiar effects upon vagrant crinoline that crinoline staid mostly within doors. Thus the accomplishments of Miss Pinkerby developed themselves. She sang sweet little ballads and played languishing waltzes all day long; and all the evening she floated like a soft white cloud held together sashwise by a yard of rainbow, on aromatic airs composed of Labitzky and Lubin.

She was kind to me, and it was very comfortable; and my anxieties, caused by annoying recollections, wore away. Congress water gradually evaporated from my mind. I was, in a measure, myself again, excepting that I never thought of fishing.

One day, however, I yielded to the persuasions of an ardent amateur, and took advantage of the first luxurious weather Newport had known during my visit. We fished. Good fortune fell upon my companion; but as for me, I felt that the sport had lost its charm. I lost first my reputation as an angler, and subsequently my apparatus. Then I went away.

I strode toward the hotel. I passed the beach. Bathers disported in strange attire. The sea was dotted with heads, variously bobbing. A figure emerged, dripping and diffuse. It ran by me. It screamed an aqueous salutation. It invited me to wait and see it home. I gazed with a full heart and a vacant face. It was she.

I saw Lina Pinkerby in red flannel. Not only red, but wet. She seemed to need squeezing, not to say wringing out. As she skipped away to her dressing-house, I thought of fresh-boiled lobsters of magnified proportions. Perhaps I could have borne it, but for the wet and the legs. The trowsers overwhelmed me, and the presence of palpable bifurcation made me swell with grief. And swathed in red flannel! She left a sinuous rivulet in her path. Was this the stream of oblivion I had hoped for?

It was the second time within two weeks that my spirits had been dashed and weakened with water.

Presently Miss Pinkerby came forth, dry and neatly costumed, and handed me a damp bundle to carry. She was lively and glowed with more than usual animation, but her smile had lost its savor, and the glistening of her eye was salt.

"Do you swim, Mr. Plimkins?" she asked.

"Not for pleasure," said I.

"Are you fond of the water?"

"To fish from, I am," said I.

"Now I like nothing so well," said she. "And we bathe here every day when it is warm. Sometimes I bathe twice a day, I am so fond of it. I keep two dresses. The other one is yellow. Do you like my dress, Mr. Plimkins?"

"Infinitely," said I; it would be nice in a comic pantomime."

"Yes, it is generally thought pretty," she said.

Then I became stolid, and spoke no more, except with pointed brevity. Miss Pinkerby offered an opinion on the weather, with which I disagreed. She afterwards hinted at the advantages of riding on so lovely a day—a turn of conversation which I did not encourage.

The next day I turned my face in the direction of Franconia. I had yet three weeks for Summer recreation, and I craved a brief season of undisturbed happiness.

Very well, then. My friend who reads will be likely to understand that I am somewhat given to fastidiousness. But in the case of Miss Larcher, all afflicting doubts vanished one by one. Her sensitiveness on points of pure feminine taste was very affecting. I gradually melted beneath her influence, and gave myself up to absorption.

Sometimes I obtruded a remonstrance in the matter of trout-fishing.

"Oh don't, please don't, Mr. Plimkins," she would say, "you distress me when you speak of it."

"But consider—"

"Now you know I never consider; don't ask me to consider. Besides, I can't spare you. To-morrow we must see the flume again."

"Some other day, perhaps."

"Next day we do Lafayette. Now tell me, Mr. Plimkins, do I trouble you so much?"

"Troub'e? How can you say such things?"

"Well, it seems to me—don't you think, now, that you are tired of running on these foolish expeditions with me?"

"Dear Miss Larcher—"

"I think you want to get back to that horrid brook, with your naughty rod and line, and hurt and kill those sweet little fish that taste so good at tea."

"I want to catch them for your tea."

"No, it is not right, I'm sure."

"Yet you eat them."

"I know, dear Mr. Plimkins, I am very inconsistent; truly I am very bad; but don't scold, please."

Bless my heart!—to scold her! The notion was too wretchedly ridiculous. And so she had everything her own way.

Ah, those days of sunshine at Franconia! What never-ending delights came crowding along! There was joy in everything; in the fair lake of echoes, reposing in serene and tranquil beauty, hugged round by giant mountain arms; in the Indians on its shores, who chattered gibberish incomprehensible to themselves, and who sold us, at high prices, untrustworthy baskets and impracticable fans; in the tin horn, at one end of which I used to distort my face and bring on pains of ague, awakening the voices of the everlasting crags near by; in the eccentric cascade, in the neighborhood of which no water had been seen since the memory of residents; in the infantile tame bears, which ate raspberries freely, and tore the garments of those who proferred them; in the hot and weary paths of Cannon Mountain; in the dizzy acclivities and hard-backed ponies of Lafayette; in all that came within the sphere of our consideration.

I was never happier, and I intimated some such idea in a quiet way to Miss Larcher. She said she was glad. I remember perfectly well that she said she was glad, and it was on the evening of my sixth blissful day that she told me so.

Six days there were, during which my sun of delight was undimmed. On the seventh there appeared a spot. It was nearly six feet high, and well whiskered, and it displeased me.

It came from New York, and its name was Copsey. Copsey had personal attractions and a note of introduction to the Larcher family. For these reasons he was permitted to attach himself to the Larcher party. Consequently I reviled him.

Laura was amiable and kind-hearted, I said to myself. I said so because she took this Copsey, who was twice as big as she, under her protection, as it were, and assisted him to enjoy the scenery, and showed him all the lions, including the bears, for an entire day. I did not see her ten minutes, excepting at dinner, and then she outraged my feelings by asking me to help Mr. Copsey to butter.

By the time the gong sounded for tea I was greatly discomfited. I entertained vicious thoughts respecting Copsey. I observed that he was treated with solicitude. As we all turned parlorward, I assumed desperation and announced a determination to fish on the morrow.

"What! Oh no, Mr. Plimkins," said Laura, "you will not leave us?"

"No," said I, "but I shall fish."

"Now that is a parodox," said she.

"Can you think it so?" said I.

"But you will not forget your promise," urged she.

"We many of us are apt to be too forgetful," said I.

"That is very true," she answered penitently, as it seemed—and then confidingly, "have I done anything wrong, Mr. Plimkins?"

"What an odd question," I said; "I think I am interrupting you—good night!"

"Mr. Plimkins," said Laura, pathetically, this time, beyond a doubt, "good-night! if you will say it. I shall breakfast early to-morrow morning—very early—as soon as the gong sounds. You will sit by me?"

Of course there was nothing to be said in return but a full acquiescence. And so I left, and went, not fully at ease, to newspapers, and finally to bed.

Why need I recall too vividly the alternations of rapture and despair which followed? One day the thermometer of my hope would rise to fever heat; the next, it would sink into the tube out of sight. I longed to vituperate Copsey, who had embittered my existence, but pride restrained me. One day he attempted familiarity with me.

"I think you spoke of fishing?" said he.

"Well, sir," said I.

"I fish a little," said he; "I should like to join you some day."

"I generally fish in solitude," said I, "and besides, I would not draw you from more refreshing in-door entertainment."

He laughed a little, and pulled the ends of his moustache. I burned with wrath, almost to blazing, and left him for fear I should get put out.

One evening Laura and I stood watching the newly arrived as they descended from the stage coach. Suddenly she cried out queerly, and darted away. The next instant she was shaking vigorous hands with a male, whose appearance was unprepossessing by reason of dust. She accompanied him within doors, and for an hour was unseen in her accustomed evening resorts. At length she entered the parlor with the stranger, made him known to every one as Mr. Murvison, from New York, and withdrew to a distant corner, shutting herself out from the world but him.

I felt more kindly toward Copsey, and interchanged some observations with him on the state of the atmosphere.

That night I went to bed in a dismal frame of mind. It was a wonder, now I think of it, I did not go in my hat and boots. I dreamed thus:

I had grown a fin or two, wore scales, and had a flappy tail; yet I retained my individual consciousness. There were others like me. One was whiskered, and I recognized in him the Copsey genus. Another, which I avoided with assiduous care, was of the nature of Murvison. We floated in pellucid waters. We acknowledged an inclination for worms, and yearned for grasshoppers. We were prone to much opening and shutting of the mouth, and other singularities.

We saw appear above us a well-known face surmounted by a well-known hat, and supported by a well-known body, clad in a well-known garb. We were alarmed, but a fascination prevented us from hastening away. Our fins shook with emotion.

Presently we saw a line descend among us. From it depended a hook on which hung bait. Such bait! It was a smile and a sweet word deftly twisted together. I had no power of resistance. I dashed forward and suffered. I felt myself torn from my proper way of life. As I dangled helpless in the air I saw my beautiful capturess smiling unconcerned at my agony. Shame and sorrow overcame me. I was trifled with for a while, then disentangled, and cast carelessly aside.

I writhed in blind mortification until a sharp shock roused me. Alas! it was the Copsey gasping and struggling vainly by my side. I wriggled about with some difficulty, and obtained a view of her who had deluded and destroyed us. Her face was mildly radiant as ever, and intent upon the waves below. Then I was reckless. With one impetuous throb of my tail I flung myself in the air, and fell with a dull splash into my element. I was free again.

I awoke and found myself on the floor, amidst the shattered fragments of the wash-basin. My dream was over, and the scales had fallen. I was no longer a foolish fish.

The next morning I sought Mr. Copsey and opened the subject of angling. He lifted his eyebrows.

"Are you going?" asked he.

"I am," said I, with energy.

"But," said he, "do you not fish in solitude?"

"Not when I know a companion in distress," said I.

"Then you do not care for more refreshing in-door entertainment?" said he.

My heart ached, but with a degree of self-command that surprised myself, I winked.

"Do you know about Murvison?" he asked.

"Not I," I answered.

"I have just heard," he continued, "that it has long been understood that he is to marry Miss Larcher. They are near neighbors in New York."

"Ah!"

"Yes."

"Let us go fish."

As we stepped from the door we encountered Miss Larcher and Mr. Murvison. I displayed my rod defiantly.

"Going to fish, gentlemen?" she asked, airily.

"We are going to fish, Miss Larcher," I said—"going to fish for trout."

"Well, together, I think you will get many," she said. "Do try, for Mr. Murvison is very fond of them, and so am I, too, you know, Mr. Plimkins. Now see if you can bring home ever so many."

From that time I caught trout incessantly while I remained in Franconia. I supplied all that the hotel needed, every day, and at the end of a week I wound up my visit with a very large string.

I think that in future I shall fish more than ever.—Harper's Monthly.

THE PRESIDENT'S WORDS.

GETTYSBURG.

FOURSCORE and seven years ago, our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We are met to dedicate a portion of it as the final resting-place of those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here; but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work that they have thus far so nobly carried on. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that the dead shall not have died in vain; that the nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom; and that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth. November, 1865.

THE DECLARATION A WRECK.

Let us hear Judge Douglas' view of that part of the Declaration of Independence, which declares that "All men are created equal." Here it is: "No man can vindicate the character, motives, and conduct of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, except upon the hypothesis that they referred to the white race alone, and not to the African, when they declared all men to have been created equal; that they were speaking of British subjects on this continent, being equal to British subjects born and residing in Great Britain." My good friends, read that carefully over, some leisure hour, and ponder well upon it: see what a mere wreck, mangled ruin, it makes of our once glorious Declaration of Independence. I had thought the Declaration promised something better than the condition of British subjects; but, no: it only meant that we should be equal to them in their own oppressed and unequal condition. According to that, it gave no promise, that, having kicked off the king and lords of Great Britain, we should not at once be saddled with a king and lords of our own. I understand, you are preparing to celebrate the "Fourth" to-morrow week. Suppose, after you read the Declaration once, in the old-fashioned way, you read it once more, with Judge Douglas' version. It will run thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all British subjects who were on this continent eighty-one years ago were created equal to all British subjects born and then residing in Great Britain.—June, 1857.

VALLANDIGHAM.

Long experience has shown that armies cannot be maintained unless desertion shall be punished by the severe penalty of death. The case requires, and the Law and the Constitution sanction, this punishment. Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier-boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of the wily agitator who induces him to desert?—July, 1862.

THE NEGRO.

There will be some black men who can remember, that, with silent tongue and clenched teeth and steady eye and well-poised bayonet, they have helped mankind on to this great consummation; while, I fear, there will be some white ones unable to forget that, with malignant heart and deceitful speech, they have striven to hinder it.—August, 1863.

A SIMPLE mode of keeping butter in warm weather, where ice is not handy, is to invert a common flower-pot over the butter, with some water in the dish in which the butter is laid. The orifice at the bottom may be corked or not. The porousness of the earth-ware will keep the butter cool. It will be better still if the pot be covered with a wet cloth, the rapid abstraction of heat by external evaporation causing the butter to become hard.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1865.

THE OPERA IN SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Opera season at the Academy of Music terminates this week. If we take into consideration the fact that it is one of the best, if not the best, we have ever had in San Francisco, that it has received the universal commendation of the press and praise of the people, and that, notwithstanding these favorable conditions, it has occasioned a heavy pecuniary loss to the Manager, it is a fair presumption that it will not be revived in this city for many years to come. Managers are not always willing to sacrifice themselves to the public taste for amusement—at least to the extent of $28,000, which we understand is the sum of Mr. Maguire's losses.

But it may be argued that there were at one time two opera troupes performing in this city, dividing the patronage of the public; that at first both were well attended, and that at no time was this divided patronage insufficient to support one troupe; that more than this cannot be expected of a population the size of ours; that the final "combination" came too late—when the people were beginning to be weary; that taking into consideration the rival attractions of Gottschalk, the public have bestowed a degree of patronage on musical and operatic entertainments, totally unprecedented for the population, and that against Mr. Maguire's losses should be fairly placed the amount contributed by the people to these amusements.

While Mr. Maguire deserves great credit for having engaged at considerable risk an excellent troupe, one of whose artistes at least was superior to any ever before in this country; while he has continued, almost at the sacrifice of his entire fortune, to fulfil his engagements to his company and the public honorably, and while he has exhibited a degree of pluck and perseverance worthy of the name of genius, it must not be forgotten that he has simply failed in a speculation which no one was better fitted to calculate than he, and that this failure was owing to no deceit which had been practiced upon him, false representation or unfulfilled engagements. A combination of circumstances which was liable to occur to the most sagacious business man, had exerted an adverse influence over his plans. On the arrival of his company the ground was already taken by a rival troupe. It is not necessary to enter into the details of their rivalry or their relative merits. Neither of them were successful, and we are safe in saying that it is not probable that an event of this kind will occur again. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that Signor Bianchi had to be subjugated, and that Manager Maguire must nearly undergo bankruptcy as the price of this important lesson.

Although, excepting San Francisco, the field for operatic entertainment is limited in California, and the expense of transporting artists hither is no inconsiderable item, it must be remembered that the introduction of the opera in New York was even more unsatisfactory in comparison to the population than here. We do not think it proven that the season just closed justifies an abandonment of the opera. If experience has revealed anything, it has been the fact that a single good opera troupe can draw paying audiences, although present patronage may not justify the engagement of any of the principal "star" performers of the old world. In the meantime, it is not necessary to be alarmed for the future. It remains for our musical public to bind up the wounds of their sorely-beaten, but still gallant impressario, by giving him a benefit that shall amount to something substantial as a pecuniary result and bid him good luck and "God speed" in his next endeavor.

Courage of the Late James Nisbet.—On the body of the late James Nisbet was found a will written in pencil and bearing internal evidence of having been composed after the ship had struck. An incident of greater coolness and thoughtful concern for others at a moment fraught with so much agony and peril, has seldom been recorded. The ill-fated vessel probably contained many whose vocations and habits of life had often brought them face to face with Death, and who no doubt did not forget their dignity and manliness in this last trying moment, but we doubt if their example exceeded the lesson taught by this humble civilian and peaceful man of letters.

NEW BOOKS.

THE following works were received from A. Roman & Co. too late for notice last week:

The President's Words. A Selection of Passages from the Speeches, Addresses, and Letters of Abraham Lincoln. pp. 186. Boston: Walker, Fuller & Co.

Of all the memorials yet published of our late President, this volume is the most tasteful and appropriate. It is composed of selections from the speeches and letters of Mr. Lincoln, carefully and chronologically arrayed under five heads, viz: political systems; slavery and anti-slavery; faith; internal improvements; conclusion, with a liberal index to the several quotations. The selections have been made by celebrated clergymen, from an idea, born of the memorial service, on which occasion many of the "words" contained in this volume were read to the different congregations. The book is prefaced by the following touching and simple motto, borrowed from a characteristic telegram of the President: "All goes well with us. Everything seems quiet now." Of the quality of its contents we can give no better criticism than the tribute of Mr. Emerson:

"He is the author of a multitude of good sayings, so disguised as pleasantries that it is certain they had no reputation at first but as jests; and only later, by the very acceptance and adoption they find in the mouths of millions, turn out to be the wisdom of the hour. I am sure, if this man had ruled in a period of less facility of printing, he would have become mythological in a very few years, like Æsop or Pilpay, or one of the Seven Wise Masters, by his fables and proverbs.

"But the weight and penetration of many passages in his letters, messages, and speeches, hidden now by the very closeness of their application to the moment, are destined hereafter to a wide fame. What pregnant definitions! what unerring common sense! what foresight! and, on great occasions, what lofty, and, more than national, what humane tone! His brief speech at Gettysburg will not easily be surpassed by words on any recorded occasion. This, and one other American speech, that of John Brown to the court that tried him, and a part of Kossuth's speech at Birmingham, can only be compared with each other, and with no fourth."

Companion Poets for the People. Illustrated. Songs for All Seasons. By Alfred Tennyson. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

The second number of the Companion Poets. The selections from Tennyson in this volume do not seem to have been as critically made as those from Longfellow in the preceding number. We have "Oriana" and the "Skipping Rope," from his earlier poems, and "The Ringlet," from his latest works, which might have all been well omitted. One or two songs from "Maud" would not also be missed from this volume (though perhaps more popular) if the editor had given us "Locksley Hall" or "Sir Galahad," instead. Nearly every reader of Tennyson has admired these simple and beautiful verses, contained in this volume:

"Home they brought her warrior dead:
She nor swooned nor uttered cry:
All her maidens, watching, said,
'She must weep or she will die.'

"Then they praised him, soft and low,
Called him worthy to be loved,
Truest friend and noblest foe;
Yet she neither spoke nor moved.

"Stole a maiden from her place,
Lightly to the warrior stept,
Took the face-cloth from the face;
Yet she neither moved nor wept.

"Rose a nurse of ninety years,
Set his child upon her knee—
Like Summer tempest came her tears—
'Sweet my child, I live for thee.'"

But we cannot conceive what motive there was in also adding the author's later and weaker version of the same poem:

"Home they brought him slain with spears,
They brought him home at even-fall;
All alone she sits and hears
Echoes in his empty hall,
Sounding on the morrow.

"The Sun peep'd in from open field,
The boy began to leap and prance,
Rode upon his father's lance,
Beat upon his father's shield—
'O hush, my joy, my sorrow.'"

An equal doubt might exist as to the propriety of adding to a collection which contains the sweet cradle song from the "Princess" entitled "Soft and Low," such mild bathos as "What does Little Birdie say," from "Sea Dreams."

Life of Horace Mann. By his Wife. pp. 602. Boston: Walker, Fuller & Co.

Mrs. Mann frankly confesses the difficulties of writing a memoir of her late husband from so near a point of view, and admits that where "others see faults" she only sees virtues. Nevertheless, trusting chiefly to letters and a journal kept by the great "Educator," she has made a very creditable volume, which will be read with interest by Mr. Mann's "eighty thousand children" who have grown up since he first entered upon his educational work in Massachusetts. It is the history of a life of high aims and instincts—a chronicle of incessant labor and privation for the achievement of noble results.

Essays in Criticism. By Mathew Arnold. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

Most Americans know Matthew Arnold only as an Oxford Professor who has written very clever poetry. Such will be astonished at the power, analytic subtlety and critical insight of these essays. Perhaps some who believe that the "Censor should not write plays," will be ready to assert that there is a natural incompatibility between the functions of the bard and the critic, and will accord but little value to his judgment. But even the most prejudiced and old-fashioned reader—however he may be wedded to these time-honored beliefs—on turning over Mr. Arnold's pages, will confess that of all the English essayists, from Carlyle and Macaulay down to the snarlers of the Saturday Review, he is the least dogmatic, the most genial and sympathetic. He naturally claims that criticism should be based upon a rule, which "may be summed up in one word: Disinterestedness," and answers the question how criticism is to show "disinterestedness," as follows:

"By keeping aloof from practice—by resolutely following the law of its own nature, which is to be a free play of the mind on all subjects which it touches; by steadily refusing to lend itself to any of those ulterior, political, practical considerations about ideas which plenty of people will be sure to attach to them, but which criticism has really nothing to do with. Its business is, as I have said, simply to know the best that is known and thought in the world, and try in its turn, making this known, to create a current of true and fresh ideas. Its business is to do this with inflexible honesty, with due ability; but its business is to do no more, and to leave alone all questions of practical consequences and applications—questions which will never fail to have due prominence given to them. For what is at present the tone of criticism in this country? It is that practical considerations cling to it and stifle it; it subserves interests not its own; our organs of criticism are organs of men and parties having practical ends, and with them those practical ends are the first thing, and the play of mind the second."

The work contains fourteen essays, (chiefest among which is "Influence of Literary Academies,") including the three lectures "On Translating Homer," and the "Last Words." The former lecture is particularly to be commended to the scholar. Of his style, a late reviewer in the Atlantic Monthly says:

"As a stylist, he is singularly inartificial. Would that our American writers might take a lesson from Arnold's prose, and correct their ambitious rhetoric, affected quaintness, and other varieties of fine writing, by this pure, simple, honest English. The peculiarity of his style, we should say, is its freedom from peculiarity. It is the style of a cultivated, thoughtful man, without the pedantry and mannerism which thoughtful and cultivated men so often contract. Easy, almost careless in its movement, but far from careless in its choice of words, it is neither bookish nor vulgarly colloquial, but maintains a just mean between elaborateness and rudeness. In our young days Macaulay was considered the model writer, and Ruskin has been thought to occupy that place in these latter years; but Macaulay is tumid, and even Ruskin stilted and stiff, in comparison with Mathew Arnold."

What I Saw on the West Coast of South and North America, and the Hawaiian Islands. By H. Willis Baxley, M. D. New York: Appleton & Co.

Mr. Baxley, as Special Commissioner of the United States, visited a few years ago parts of the west coast of America and the Hawaiian Islands, and has recorded in this volume his impression of those regions. As a mere history of travel his work is very interesting, although he does not seem to have been influenced by any general romantic effect of climate or scenery from very searching and critical analysis into details. Mr. Baxley has been shocked several times by certain religious customs and habits, and has enunciated this fact with a good deal of honest bluntness and sincerity, whatever may be the justice of his impressions. The book takes the reader through California, and the author has devoted some space to descriptions of the Big Trees, Yosemite, and the Geysers. It is illustrated, and printed in large type on clear white paper. We have given some extracts in another column.

Conversion of the Roman Empire. By Charles Merivale, B. D. New York: Appleton & Co.

The eight lectures comprising this volume by the author of A History of Rome under the Roman Empire, will be read by all scholars. Mr. Merivale considers the conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity to have been effected principally in four ways: 1. By the force of external evidence, or the apparent fulfilment of recorded prophecy and the historical testimony of miracles. 2. By internal evidence, the sense of spiritual destitution, the consciousness of sin, and the acknowledged need of a sanctifier and a redeemer. 3. The testimony of martyrdom and godly example. 4. The temporal success with which Christianity was eventually crowned.

Mary, the Handmaid of the Lord. By the author of the Schonberg-Cotta Family, etc. New York: M. W. Dodd.

The many readers of the Schonberg-Cotta Family—that clever picture of the great men of the Reformation, in their domestic and social life—will find in this picturesque and explanatory story of the Virgin, less material interest, and more of a spiritual, mystic, and didactic tendency. The typography of the volume is excellent, and the binding beautiful and appropriate.

AT THE FAIR.

AS I cannot hope to add anything to the fast-increasing literature of the Fair, or indeed to offer any ideas of practical utility concerning it, perhaps I ought to say nothing. The Bulletin's daily review has interested me, not only for the care and patience displayed in its details, but for the apparent conscientiousness and genial good humor of its criticisms. Being naturally too indolent and inaccurate to excel in the first two qualities, and perhaps somewhat deficient in the two last, the following may afford the reader some change from the regular notices.

As the central figure of the Fair is the colossal statue of Mr. Lincoln, it challenges the attention of the visitor with a degree of self-assertion which I think quite inconsistent with the natural humility of the original. To be plainer, I fear that the real mistake of the sculptor has not been one of detail or outline, but in his conception of Mr. Lincoln as a colossal figure. There is no irreverence in saying that our late President had neither the outward heroic aspect which permits this exaggeration, nor the dominant qualities of mind and character which take exaggeration as their appropriate symbol. Perhaps, had he possessed those godlike attributes which would have found this expression, he would not have been as universally beloved. As a colossal figure, he seems removed from that kindly contact with the people; he is a little too large for the heart, and not quite large enough to fill the brain of most Americans. Artistically, the size is unfortunate. Mr. Lincoln was a tall man, but his height, owing to his peculiar formation of limb, was not a grace—the colossal figure intensifies this defect and gives it the effect of a caricature. We have in this monstrous effigy of our late Chief Magistrate, simply protracted homeliness—uncouthness prolonged to an indefinite extent quite beyond the power of any intrinsic kindliness to transfuse or make picturesque. I say this with no wish to decry the imperfections of the subject, nor with any intention of overlooking the general merits of Mr. Mezzara's details, or the insuperable difficulties which modern costume offers to sculpture. I do not object to his prefering the ordinary every-day dress as more suitable to the simplicity of his subject, but the error of proportion makes a giant in a dress coat hardly a fit object for serious and tender contemplation. His mistake is perhaps the more pardonable in a country where Nature is apt to fall into the same errors, and to produce inordinate squashes. and gigantic cabbages. Not far from the statue will be found pumpkins, beets, apples and pears, quite as exaggerated in outline, and I am willing to believe as inevitably sacrificing delicacy, sweetness, and refinement for coarser fibre and size

Perhaps because I am not of a mechanical turn of mind, and never constructed anything but a ship, in my boyhood, which had a singular tendency to keel over and continue its voyage bottom upward, I am unduly fascinated by machinery. I usually turn into the room devoted to this purpose immediately on entering the Fair, and amuse myself by watching the revolutions of the fly-wheels, the endless continuity of travelling bands and belts, and in listening to the half-human buzz and clatter of stamps and mills, which always impress me as though—like the Prince in the fairy tale—I had become suddenly alive to the language of inanimate objects. The labor of machinery conveys to the lazy man, like myself, none of that tacit reproach which individual or manual labor always suggests to an idle bystander. There is no spectacle of straining sinews and perspiring brows, which robs honest industry of much of its picturesqueness. There is always a dim, prophetic shadowing of a future time when all work will be done by this myriad-handed geni, and man will slip through life solely by the exercise of volition. But if machinery has neither human frailty nor weakness, it has neither human sympathy nor kindness. Any one of these noiseless, shifting, shiny bands will take you up, without outcry, save your own, without anger, without pity, remorselessly whirl you around under revolving barrel, and fling you—a shattered wreck—upon the floor, continuing its endless placid journey without a tremor of remembrance or regret for the life crushed out below it. That smooth, shining piston-rod, whose oiled surface almost invites your hand to linger caressingly upon it, will quietly remove that necessary member from your body, crush its bones to powder, and go on as smoothly and as patiently as ever, wiping the stains from its treacherous arm without excitement or compassion. Yet there are always people loitering about, whose carelessness leads you to think that they had "made a covenant" with Behemoth, and that they could disarm this fateful monster.

The picture gallery, in its present condition, I am frank to confess, does not exercise any of this terrible fascination. I am unconscious of any period when I could not have been torn away from it without much struggling and resistance. Like the photographs of our familiar acquaintances, which adorn our walls, there is always something that invites criticism. The self-satisfied air which these individuals wear is apt to unconsciously excite our resentment, even though we know the individual to be personally modest and retiring. If the pictures are not good likenesses we are apt to experience an ill-defined feeling that our friend has unwittingly developed under the camera some quality of which we were unconscious—some hidden faculty which we knew not. Of course the photograph has in later years undergone much improvement. The operator, though he deal with sunbeams instead of oil colors, is expected to have some artistic taste. The tendency of most sitters to preternatural stiffness and statuesque attitudes, I am glad to observe, is undergoing correction. They are not allowed to sit with their hands on the backs of chairs—the display of rings which that position offers not being considered now as essential to a good likeness. I could wish that equal good sense would obtain in regard to backgrounds and accessories. I do not see why gentlemen should be required to rest their hands on the fragment of a Corinthian column—a habit I am willing to believe not familiar to them in real life under any circumstances. I am at a loss to understand why the gentleman from San Andreas, whose features and garments are unmistakably American, chooses to have himself represented as standing on a terrace beside the Lake of Como; why Mr. Jones, of Front street, prefers to appear in a business suit on the plains of Arabia, with a palm tree over each shoulder; why I, who am not fond of ancient history, should be obliged to stand in an evening dress, with gloves and cane, just beneath the Acropolis, while a Grecian sunset diffuses its chaste glories generally around my person. The striking sameness of the photographic furniture is another defect that should be remedied; in its present peculiarity most sitters appear to have been originally inhabitants of the same house—many. occupants of the same room. Who does not know that little round table with its cloth drooping in accurate folds—possibly the most impossible piece of furniture extant—on which one-half of San Francisco has leaned its right arm, or read its good book. Who does not know that curtain which always looks out of place; that stone balustrade which always appears on a parlor carpet. as if it were a part of the furniture of a drawing-room; the great arm-chair on which most people lean as they never leaned before and never will again. But this digression bids fair to lead me away from the picture gallery, of which it suddenly occurs to me I have something serious to say.

There are, as is usual, in such exhibitions, many poor pictures, and some abominable drawings by young people of either sex, which good taste, I think, would have ruled out of the collection. But I observe with some concern that they afford a convenient opportunity for many simple-minded young men to air their callow criticism, and to make merry over the feeble efforts of an age and condition from which they themselves, I should judge, have not been long emancipated. I would have these young gentlemen remember that there are some things that it is good taste and true criticism to leave uncriticized, and that, poor as many of these efforts undoubtedly are, they must be endured as long as there are loving parents and doting relations to leaven this otherwise selfish world, and that it may be considered doubtful whether the cheap reputation made by a scurrile jest or disparaging comment is as necessary to the formation of character as that gentlemanliness which respects the weaknesses as well as the virtues of others. Being the other day in the gallery at an unfrequented hour, I came upon a hard-faced woman in that lustreless black which is the symbol of protracted mourning, who was dusting one of the most atrocious pictures I ever saw with a thoughtful care and tenderness that I would not have otherwise thought her capable of. The picture, if I remember rightly, represented a frightful storm at sea which would have proved fatal to any vessel less astonishing than the one which now rode the surges. Huge waves of guava jelly threatened to overwhelm her deck, and large flakes of verunicilli hung heavily on her spars and stately bowsprit. A lee-shore, the more terrible from its being composed apparently of chunks of old iron, threatened the hapless vessel with instant destruction. To add to the danger that environed her, out of an inky curtain to windward, a species of highly vindictive lightning forked—I should rather say, pitchforked—malevolently at three giants who composed the crew. As I was endeavoring to scrutinize the picture with an appearance of interest, the old woman timidly approached me.

"You'll see it here in a much better light, sir."

I turned and took the required position. It certainly was a more favorable light. As I stood beside the black bombazined female and looked at the picture, somehow I thought the bedaubed canvass faded quite away, and a bright young face, which might have resembled the one beside me, before grief, care and anxiety had drawn harsh lines around it, beamed pleasantly out of the frame. Still looking at the picture in this remarkably favorable light, I thought it changed to a long street down which a blithe-faced boy with his drawing book and satchel was passing. Again it changed, but this time it was to the hill beside the sea—where a little headstone struggled out of a mound of flowers. Just then the shadow of some passing visitor fell upon the frame. The black bombazined female noiselessly slipped away, and in turning round. somehow I found I had lost the favorable light, and was gazing only at the wretched daub which had at first excited my merriment.

I had intended to say something about Roger's statuettes and the New England Kitchen, but I find that I have already occupied the space allotted to me, and must defer this irregular notice till next week.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House the burlesque of Leah the Forsook; or, the Shrewish Maiden, was produced on Monday to a good house. This is not the London edition, I find, but was written by the late Mr. Frank Wood, one of the editors of the late Vanity Fair. It is not a very sparkling production in a literary point of view, though many of the scenes are very comical. Mr. Setchell deserves credit for the apt local hits with which he has brightened up the piece—every one of them hit the mark. His impersonation of "Leah" was very ludicrous, and his tragi-comic attitudiuizing elicited shouts of laughter. Mr. Courtaine, who was cast for "Madelina," was on Monday seized with his old illness, and Mr. Franks. who at very short notice undertook the part, filled it very creditably. Mr. Franks is a thoroughly reliable actor. The burlesque was very creditably performed throughout, and the choruses were well sung by some of the members of the chorus of the late lamented Bianchi opera troupe; it is not true that the prime old tenor himself has accepted an engagement to appear in a series of burlesques at Maguire's Opera House. Last night Mr. Setchell had a good benefit, and won much applause by his impersonation of "Wilkins Micawber' in David Copperfield. This play, with Leah the Forsook as an afterpiece, will be played this afternoon and evening.

The brilliant Vestavali is probably, even as I write, in this city. If report speak truly, Vestavali is a star of the first magnitude, or more—a brilliant meteor blazing in the theatrical sky. Can one prophecy too sanguinely of the success of a magnificently handsome, dashing woman with a full, rich contralto voice? In course of time, Manager Maguire will introduce all the stars in the East to our theatre-goers—that is, if money and indomitable energy be sufficient to accomplish it. Madame Vestavali commences an engagement at the Opera House as soon as sufficiently rested from her voyage.

At Wheatleigh's Eureka, the comedy of Our Friend from Victoria was performed, for the last time, for the benefit of the author. His friends and acquaintances mustered largely, and the house was well filled. He had promised a new prologue as an attraction. Friendly as the audience assembled was, the reading of the prologue was a trial to them. The old joke of announcing that the comedy could not be produced was gone through with, the old protest was made by the English gentleman from Victoria; after this an outrage on the good taste of the audience was perpetrated, which surprised every one. It was "author's night," but no one suspected that the "author" would seize on this occasion to air a little weakness which would have been better concealed. The supposititious "Newspaper Man" insists on having the comedy performed; says he has written a notice of it without seeing it; said it was a failure because it was local; had written local pieces himself, which had been failures. etc., etc., the object being to show how unjustly Mr. C. H. Webb has been treated by the press. This was rather ungrateful. With one solitary exception the notices of the press on this "comedy"—they even went to the length of calling it a comedy—have been kind and considerate. The "Newspaper Man's" speech was not clever, but he finished it up by stating a great truth, which I am glad to see made some impression on this young dramatic author, though he cannot as yet fully appreciate it. The newspaper man quoted from my last week's "Theatrical Talk:" "Young dramatic authors ought to have their first efforts criticised; it is good for them." I am really much pleased that this inchoate dramatist remembers this. I would now give him a little piece of advice: Let him, if he ever writes another play, and the criticism of the press appears to him unjust, prove to the critics that their statements are logically incorrect, and they will no doubt make the amende honorable by retracting—I shall be happy to do so. Whining, on general principles, at "severity," "injustice," "prejudice," "jealousy," etc., can accomplish nothing; it cannot make a sorry farce, stretched into three acts, a good comedy. The above remarks are made in the best possible spirit. As Mr. Webb makes the "Newspaper Man" say in his prologue: "Young dramatic authors ought to have their first efforts criticised; it is good for them." Mr. W. D. Shiels, the Scotch comedian, made his first appearance on Tuesday, choosing for the occasion the character of "Bailie Nicol Jarvie," in the drama of Rob Roy. He has made a most favorable impression on all who have witnessed his performance. Mr. Shiels is an actor of sterling merit, well skilled in his profession. The play was well played throughout. Mr. Wheatleigh, who does everything he undertakes well, played "Rob Roy," a character by no means suited to him, with considerable power. Mr. Torning quite distinguished himself in the character of "Dugal," and gained much applause. Mrs. Judah was sufficiently tragic as "Helen McGregor." Mrs. Yeamans gained much credit for her dialect and by the manner in which she danced a Highland fling. Miss Clarkson sang "You'll Remember me" very sweetly, and really took pains to act her part, and the play went off remarkably well. The next novelty will be the production of Guy Mannering, in which Mr. Shiels will take the part of "Dandie Dimont," and Mr. Wheatleigh will appear in the character of "Meg Merrilies," in imitation of Miss Charlotte Cushman. Surely this ought to draw a crowded house. Mr. Wheatleigh's talent all know, and that of Mr. W. D. Shiels is acknowledged by all who have seen him. This afternoon and evening "Dandie Dimont" and "Meg Merrilies" will appear, and no doubt give immense satisfaction.

At Wilson's mammoth Circus, (in the magnificent new pavilion,) the Buislay Family are causing a veritable sensation. Their feats are fearfully dangerous, quite novel, and extraordinarily dexterous. I have seen numbers of "Bounding Brothers," but the brothers Julio and Esteban far surpass any gymnasts at present in the ring; they are perfect miracles of muscularity, their act Le Moulinet Gigantesque, their performance with La Perche Perileuse and thrillingly sensational and hazardous leaps on the Incomprehensible Ladder will grant a new sensation to the oldest circus frequenter who thinks he has seen all that can be accomplished. That the Buislay Family will prove to the contrary, he may take the word of

TOUCHSTONE.

ENGLISH RUSTIC HUMOR.

THERE is a great deal of human kindness mixed up with the characteristic ignorance and obstinacy of the English rural classes. There is many a Good Samaritan under a rough exterior; their mode of sympathy is clumsy, I allow; a nervons person may not find it very pleasant to be greeted with, "Lor', maister, how bad you be looking: it don't seem to I that you be long for this world." This is considered a proper and polite mode of salutation in the west. I heard an old woman reproaching her neighbor for going to a quack doctor, adding: "There now, you be wasting terrible —you be little better than a 'natomy—but it's all a your own fault, for arn't us warned in the prayer-book against 'false doctoring?'" A farmer of my acquaintance was not qnite so orthodox. He said to me one evening, "Parson giv'd out this morn' what I can't find in my mind to hold wi'; he said quite easy like (as though it didn't matter to such as he,) that if we didn't mend our ways, and didn't leave off following the flesh and the devil, that we should for sartain perish everlastingly, and our bodies would be burnt in fire and brimstone forever and ever. Well, that's what our parson said. Now I'll tell you what I said to my missus, as us was walking home through the lower cropt meadow—says I, 'I dou't hold wi' the parson; it isn't reasonable that we should burn forever and ever—no constitution could stand it!'"

The parish where my lot was cast is, or was, quite out of the reach of the disturbing influence of progress. When I knew the district, the people had preserved many old fashioned ways and customs. It was an offence not to take "a drap of zider" when you called at a house, and they were better pleased if you would take a pipe as well. But now, I dare say, every one is vastly genteel; the farmer would most likely offer you a glass of "sherry wine," and tell you how he had had his daughters "Frenched and musicked." In one instance the progress of civilization was too much for the rustic intellect. A west-countryman, of the old-fashioned stamp, was heard to say in his last illness, that "what wi' the earth a-goin' round the sun, and the telegraphs and railways a- yin' aboot, and steamers a-whirlin' and a-whizzin', he was nigh muddled, stunned and bet;" and so he died!

Parish clerks are proverbial for their absurd mistakes, but I would back old Lee against any one of the fraternity. Though a kiud-hearted old fellow, he used to declare regularly, that he was become "a lion to his mother's children," instead of an alien. On one occasion he gave out that Mr. A—— and Mr. B—— would preach every Sunday to all eternity;" he meant alternately! Tradition says (but this I cannot vouch for) that he announced publicly, "that there would be no service next Wednesday—'kas why—master was gone a fishing for another clergyman;" officiate was the word intended. I asked Lee one day how he liked Mr. ——, who had been serving the church for a few Sundays.

"Well, sir, was his reply, "we do like him pretty fair, d'ye see, but he's so low church."

"Indeed, I am surprised to hear you say that, for he is generally considered to be rather too much the other way."

"O, law, yes, sir, he's very low church—they could hardly hear him at all dowu where my missus sits."

The following occurrence was a severe trial to our risible muscles. An interesting event had happened in the squire's family, which was immediately followed by a thanksgiving service in the church. After the minister had said, "O Lord, save this woman thy servant," the clerk responded, "Who putteth her ladyship's trust in thee."

But the richest thing of all was Lee's reply to an inquiry as to how many clergy he had known in the parish since his half-century of clerkship. He gave the names of all the rectors, beginning with the squire's great uncle, "a mighty hunter in the land," known for his unclerical exploits fifty years ago.

"But how many curates have you seen?" demanded the inquirer.

"Bless you, sir, I don't take no account of curates."

Lee's dignity had been offended by the new views of what he called a "Pussy-ite" curate, who had taken him to task for his manner of reading the responses.

"Why, sir," said he, much nettled, "if I were to read just like you, there wouldn't be a bit o' differeuce between us." And so he went on declaring to the end that "some put their faith in chariots, and some in 'orses." I don't believe Lee ever felt the same towards the inferior clergy, after the young high churchman's attempt at reform.

While on parochial matters, I must not forget the story of Churchwarden Jenkins, who was doing the honors one day to a party of archæologists, when one of them asked him to whom the church was dedicated. The former was puzzled for a moment, but suddenly recollecting himself, he said, with the utmost confidence: "To the squire, your honor; the church is dedicated to the squire, and is most times given to one of the family!" It was this same enlightened individual who proposed that the church music should be improved by introducing "a bahoon."

"A baboon!" repeated the rector, in dismay.

"Yes, sir, a baboon is a wonderful help to the musicians in the gallery—it encourages them to sing out."

The rector never could tell the story of the baboon without laughing.

I was startled, one day, by a boy running up to me, saying that his "father had the collops, and mother begged I would come directly." I found the poor fellow in a state of collapse. There is no end of the absurd mistakes which the rustics commit when attempting to describe their maladies. An old woman asked me if consumption "wasn't hereditary if you slept in the same room with the person?"

If I could have abolished or even moderated the use of cider in the district, my labors would have been much lightened. It may be thought an exaggeration, but I have known a Somersetshire laborer drink sixteen quarts of cider in a day. I asked this man what he would do if he were to become suddenly rich. He replied: "I'd zit and drink zider all day, and when I could na' zit, I'd lie."

Rural notions of morality are peculiar. If a person is found out in the commission of a crime, the common remark is: "How voolish her to be vound out." "Her," it must be observed, means "he, she, or it," indifferently. I shall never forget asking a laborer how it was that he and his family were always so poor.

"Well, I'll tell ye, sir," said he, dropping his voice to a confidential tone. "At one time there wasn't an honester veller in the parish nor I; but, d'ye see, I was always poor; so says I to myself: 'This won't do; thee must change.' So I took to stealing a bit, wasn't particular for a duck or a goose; then I went on to poaching, and then I got into jail; so says I: 'Tom, this won't do neither; thee must change again.'"

"And what do you do now?" I inquired.

"Well, sir, you see, I do mix it."

The blacksmith was the man of all others who was looked up to as the wit of the village. He was voted "very good company" by his compeers. I remember laughing heartily over some of his good sayings, which were repeated to me at the time; but they don't bear transplanting. The flavor of rustic wit is only to be enjoyed when you know the people and their surroundings. Then my profession made me acquainted with the whole parish, and their private heartburnings, envyings, and backbiting; I knew every one, from Farmer Brown, whose wife came to church in a vehicle, down to that "indifferent honest" rogue, Tom Saunders, who "did mix his morality" with a little of the other sort. The blacksmith was a landed proprietor, and owned two acres of orchard. He was respected accordingly.

One evening, rather late, I stopped at the blacksmith's to have my horse's shoes removed, for he had become lame, owing to a careless youngster having pricked his foot. As usual, a group of idlers had gathered round the smith's shop, and while waiting for my horse I heard the rustics chaffiing one another in their broad Doric. A farmer rode by, mounted on a very scurvy beast, when one of the group called out:

"I say, farmer, d'ye want a dog?"

"No," said the farmer, testily; "why should I want a dog?"

"O, thought you might want a dog to help eat that horse of yours."

"Never mind, farmer," said the blacksmith, "your horse be steady, and that's more than you can say of Jones." At this there was a great laugh.

"I tell you what," added Jones, determined not to be outdone, "this farmer's horse is so steady, that if he were a bit steadier he'd stand still altogether."

After this they got talking about a case of very hard swearing up at the squire's, in the matter of a poaching affray. The blacksmith was on the side of law and order, and he wound up by saying: "David said in his haste that all men were liars; but, dang me, he might o' said it at his leisure now, if he'd a-knowd this parish as I have done, man and boy, these forty year."

I remember having a dispute with my friend about the Prophetic Almanac, which was his only literature.

"I wonder," said I, "that as shrewd a man as yon are should believe in prophecies about the weather and public events; you must constautly see how mistaken they are in their guesses."

"For sure, I think her comes wonderful true; I know her to be true about the 'clipse, and if her can tell the 'clipses, her can tell the weather and the crops, and a summut here and there about the royal family; but how they can study it, I can't think; but then they does wonderful things up in Lunnun."

"Have you ever been up there?" I inquired.

"No, I've not, sir, but I do mean to go; for they do zey down here that a man will die voolish if he don't zee Lunnun some time in his life."

When I first settled in Somersetshire, I found the dialect not a little puzzling; for instance, who could understand "Cusin herne gonner?" I found it meant, "Can't you run good now?" "Dout the candle," is a Somersetshire expression—I suppose it is an abbreviation from "do out the candle." Then again they have many words and names for things which are unknown elsewhere. The corn-loft over the stable is called a "tallet." I can find no such word in Johnson, so I conclude it must be local. I was one day superintending the repairs of the lock of this said tallet, when I noticed that there was a triangular hole in the door.

"You may as well nail a board across that," said I to the carpenter.

"Oh, sir, don't ye do that; if you do, her can't get in."

"But I don't want any one to get in," was my rejoinder.

'Lor', sir, why not? her's better than a cat."

"Better than what?"

"I mean the owl, sir; her's better than a cat any day."

Hence I found that three-cornered holes in the tallet were an institution not to be meddled with in the west.

The curate and I used sometimes to walk together, and recount to each other our experience of the rustics. I remember in particular one long day we had on the Quantock Hills, searching for a beautiful white heath, which is occasionally found in these picturesque wilds. Some one says, "the ridiculous is memory's most adhesive plaster," and I suppose that fact enables me to recollect the following absurd story, which the curate told me that day during our walk. The week before, he said, he had been present at the deathbed of an old woman, who had lived like a Christian, as she was—good old soul; and her neighbors seemed to think she was all right, for one of them said to her: "Betty, you be going to heaven shortly, I wish you'd tak a message to my John! Do'y tell him that I be pretty comfortable, for squire lets me have the cottage rent-free, and I get two shillings a week from the parish."

"Lor' deary me," said the sick woman, in a feeble voice, "how can a poor lame soul like I be going a-rambling and a-scrabbling all over heaven, and p'raps not find your John after all?"

We had eaten our luncheon, which consisted of a crust of bread and cheese, on Danesborough, a spot interesting to archæologists; and we had resumed our search for botanical specimens further down the Combe, when a thunderstorm came on. This drove us to the shelter of an isolated cottage, which we luckily espied. The only inmate was a very infirm old woman, who was cowering over the hearth, where a few charred sticks kept up the delusion of fire. To wile the time, the curate produced from his pocket a little volume of Hudibras, from which he read some passages. Suddenly we heard the old soul at the fire sobbing audibly.

"What is the matter, my good woman?" I inquired.

"O, sir, it does me a power o' good to hear the Scriptures a-read so beautiful."

"This reminds me," said the curate, unable to suppress a smile, "of an elderly dame of my acquaintance, who exclaimed, on one occasion, 'O, those comfortable words, Mesopotamia, Pamphylia, Thrace!'"

ANECDOTE OF REV. T. S. KING.—A correspondent of the Boston Saturday Gazette, writing from the White Mountains, gives a characteristic anecdote of the late Thomas Starr King in connection with his famous book on the locality: "Starr King was slow and doubting even in a general way in striking comparisons among the 'picturesque' which he so lingered with. In many a prolonged ramble, days and weeks, in these regions, with him, I well remember erasure after erasure he would make in his notes, in his preparation of this book of his, where he was endeavoring to describe scenes by comparisons. On one occasion, it was at the gateway of the famous ravine on the north side of Mounts Jefferson and Adams, to which his own name was given, King had written, sitting on the rocks under the cone of Madison, a page of description upon the depths of the great ravine; he sought to convey his idea of the deep, dark chasm before us. After a graphic sentence or two, in which he strove with his cloud imagery—in which, too, by the way, he always discovered his remarkable knowledge of the effect of color—he was for a moment at a loss for a word. Some better word than 'deep' he wanted. One of the party cried out 'deepdownity.' 'That's it!' said King, delighted; 'that word shall tell the whole of it,' and he crumpled up the paper, preserving only 'deepdownity' for his description of the effect of the depth of King's Ravine."

THE food crop of the United States for the year 1865 will be the largest known to our history. The waste of war in provisions and cattle has been considerable, but the loss will be made up fifty-fold by the excessive productiou of the present year.

THE Connecticut people are a civil set. The Boston Traveller informs us that the Litchfield town clock has been stopped, on account of the serious illness of two or three prominent citizens, who were disturbed by its striking.

JUDGE HALIBURTON ("Sam Slick, the Clockmaker,") is engaged in annotating a new one-volume edition of his delightful satire, illustrated, which will be published in the Autumn, by Bentley of London.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"Take away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Coeytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of Squarza rise!

On Sunday night, August 20th, a Mexican woman named Gregaria was badly burned in Marysville. Guiseppe Discaljo, who keeps a grocery store next door to the woman's, ran in and louud the woman stauding up in the room against the back-door with her clothes on fire. He caught hold of her and stripped her clothes off. The bed was also on fire, which he threw out in the strect, Discaljo's hands werc burned in his efforts to save the womau. There is some doubt about her recovery. She had been drinking during the day, and it is supposed her dress caught from a candle sitting on a chair close to the bed.—Appeal.

Sheriff McClatchy has seized and advertised for sale, says the Union, on the 11th of September, the entire rolling stock of the Central California Railroad, which counects Folsom with Lincoln. This property is sold by virtue of a decree and judgment in favor of Samuel Brannan against C. L. Wilson, et al., for the sum of $139,755 59, with two per cent. interest compounding monthly since the rendition of verdict, etc. This judgment is now, and has for several months, been held and owned by stockholders of the Pacific Railroad Company, on whose account the sale will take place.

The Visalia Delta of August 16th, remarks : " Fat cattle in large numbers are being driven from the valley nearly every week. Last week Ira Van Gordon went out with a drove; this week L. B. Huff has taken out a large number. Thirty thousand beeves will be sold from Tulare within the year. This, added to the hogs. wool, bullion, etc., will make a neat little yield to our producers. We doubt whether there is a county in the State, excepting San Francisco, in which there is more money at this time in proportion to the inhabitants than in Tulare.

Saturday evening, about 10 o'clock, a man named James Cahill was shot in Virginia, Nevada. While walking towards his lodgings ; he heard the report of a pistol, felt a sting in his back, and found he was shot. The man called for assistance, and was conveyed to a Chinese wash-house contiguous, but was subsequently removed to his own quarters. He has no idea who fired the shot, as the night was very dark. The wound is not dangerous, and Cahill soon be well again.

The Gold Hill News says : " It is now claimed that the Virginia and Truckee Railroad construction will soon be under way. We are informed that the California Branch of the Pacific Railroad Company have agreed to lend $32,000 per mile of their bonds, or exchange that amount of bonds with the Truckee Railroad Company ; and our mine and mill owners have agreed to take mutual interests in furtherence of the project.

The Downieville Messenger of August 19th states that the sluices of Webster & Co., of Snake Bar, have been robbed several times just previous to their time of cleaning up. On Friday night last, Webster's partner, in concealment awaiting, discovered two men, whom he was confident were Chinamen, at the sluices. He fired twice at the robbers, wounding one or both, as appeared by the traces of blood left in departing ; they, however, made good their escape.

Relative to races during the State Fair, the Sacramento Union says : The speed programme of the State Fair has been so altered that there is but little doubt that we shall have two races between Norfolk aud Lodi. On the first day of the Fair (Monday, September 18th,) a purse of $1,000 is offered for a two-mile running race ; on the last day (Saturday, September 23d,) a purse of $2,000 is offered for a three-mile running race. Both races are free to all.

The California Stage Company on the 14th inst. commenced carrying passengers from Portland to Sacramento at reduced rates. The passage is now placed at $50, and the passeuger cau stop and rest three nights on the route. The time through is six days. It is hardly probable that this move will seriously affect the ocean liue. The fears engendered by the late disaster to the Brother Jonathan will soon wear away.

As the Petaluma was discharging freight at Lakeville, on Saturday last, Mr. Jacob Pricc fell overboard, and having a purse on his person containing about three thousand dollars, discharged it in order to keep from going to " Davy Jones " himself. Preparations are being made to fish up the money.

On the 19th inst., says the Appeal, the Jefferson Company, Brown's Valley, again cleaned up about seven thousand dollars. A most substantiul and very big ledge is crossing their incline shaft from which they are now taking their best quartz.

In the Supreme Court, August 9th, judgment in favor of Madden was reversed, aud the District Court directed to enter judgment in favor of Stratton, dismissing the complaint of the relator, with costs. This settles it that Straton shall be State Librarian.

A man named John Boyd was burned to death in his cabin near Placerville recently. The Mirror says he was about forty-five years of age, and is believed to have left no family. He crossed the Plains to Oregon in 1847, and came to this State in 1848.

ABOUT BALZAC.

THE continental correspondent of the American Literary Gazette, says : " M. Wartel, an old publisher who was ruined by de Balzac, has hinted some most deplorable stories of the novelist's love of money and contempt of the obligation of returning it. I met, a few days since in one of our newspapers, a story exhibiting this defect in his charaeter, which I will tell you. At one period of de Balzac's life he owned a periodical, Le Chronique de Paris, and as he had no credit, the printer and paper-maker reqnired weekly payments. To obtain this money he was obliged to resort to more artifi ces than can be described. One day every effort had failed, and it seemed that the periodical must stop publication. He sat iu silent despair in his office with two of the three contributors associated with him. All of a sudden the third contributor burst into the room, exclaiming : " Saved! We shall appear! I have discovered a capitalist!" De Balzac growled : " A real capitalist ? with sure 'nough money ?" " He has a pocket-book full of bank notes." De Balzac said : " Invite the fellow to dine with us next Sunday ; und look ye, gentlemen (added he, turning to his contributors.) take care yo wear good clothes and clean liren, for our all is at stake." Never, perhaps, did the old proverb, " Where there's a will there's a way," receive better demonstration than upon this occasion ; for de Balzac, stimulated by the appearance of this new horizon of hope, not only found money enough to print the current number of Le Chronique de Paris, but to redeem his silver from the pawnbroker's and to order a sumptnous dinner from the celebrated cook Chevet. of the Palais Royal. De Balzac lived then in what was one of the obscurest and remotest corners of Paris. It is so now. Judge what it must have been twenty years ago. His residence was in the Rue Cassini, which is near the observatory. Everybody but the guest was punctual. He. however, made his appearance within the five minutes of grace, and de Balzac was delighted with him, for he seemed the beau-ideal of that ingenuous shareholder whose purse is ready at any call, be it South Sea stock or Morus Multicaulis companies, lake copper mine or oil well companies—the minnow provident Heaven has made that the gudgeon go not hungered. He was a tall, thin young man, with long flat yellow hair, dressed in old-fashioned clothes, awkward, timid, embarrassed ; in fine, everything abont him showed the pigeon easy to be plucked. De Balzac held out his hand ; gave the newcomer's a hard squeeze which brought the blood to his cheek. The novelist's servant soon entered the room habited in a silver-trimmed livery (which he had borrowed from the costumer of a neighboring theatre,) and announced dinner. " Count, do me the honor to take a seat on my right," said de Balzac. " Is he noble ?" asked one of his coutributors. De Balzac replied : " Not a bit of it. I am only flattering the fool's vanity in order to get more money out of him." The prospect of an abundant supply of money put de Balzac and his contributors into excellent spirits, the repast and wines were of the best quality, and the intellectual portion of the entertainment was indeed a feast. The capitalist ate and drank and smiled, but he did not say a word. At the close of the dinner de Balzac said : " Count, you see what our ordinary bill of fare is. If you ever again feel like sharing our pot-luck, we shall feel honor and pleasure." The company adjourned to the drawing-room for coffee and cigars. De Balzuc stood with his back to the chimney, thrust his hands under the coat-tails of his blue dress-coat with gilt buttons, and said : " You know, count, that I am chief editor, absolute manager, and proprietor of Le Chronique de Paris, a periodical destiued at no distant day to ruin La Revue des Deux Mondes, and La Revue de Paris. I have been informed of your desire to become my partner. Such propositions have frequently been made to me, and, to tell you the truth, not a day passes but one or two people press me to give them a share in my periodical I have heretofore uniformly declined these offers, but the common frieud who introduced you to me is so particular a friend of mine that I can refuse him nothing, and I will make that exception in your favor which hitherto I have refused everybody. I regret, however, to say that I cannot let you have as many shares as you may desire. The very utmost I can do is to give you 50,000f. worth of shares. But I beg that yon will not ask me for another ; I cannot give it you." The capitalist replied : " M. de Balzac, I will repeat all you have said to pa ;" and he took his hat, and, bowing to the company, retired. As soon as the door closed de Balzac clasped his hands to his forehead and exclaimed : " Duped, by Jove! Auguste (said he, addressing the servant,) carry the silver to the pawnbroker's the first thing you do to-morrow morning."

A pear tree in Dr. Chapman's orchard, in Nevada, Cal. (says the Gazette,) produced, n oa twig three feet in leugth, and about the thickness of a man's finger, eighteen pounds of pears! The twig was broken off by the weight of the fruit.

Maurice Fenton, an employe in the Union Copper mine at Copperopolis, fell down a shaft 60 feet deep, Friday last and broke his neck.

Politeness and Truth.—Many persons plead a love of truth as an apology for rough manners, as if truth was never gentle and kind, but harsh, morose, and forbidding. Surely good manners and a good conscience ure no more inconsistent with each other than beauty and innoceuce, which are strikingly akin, and always look the better for companionship. Roughness and honesty are indeed sometimes found together in the same person, but he is a poor judge of human nature who takes ill manners to be a guarantee of probity of character ; or suspects a stranger to be a rascal because he has the manners of a gentleman. Some persons object to politeness, that its language is unmeaning and false. But this is easily answered. A lie is not locked up in phrase, but must exist, if at all, in the mind of the speaker. In the ordinary compliments of civilized life there is no intentiou to deceive, and consequently no falsehood. Polite language is pleasant to the ear and soothing to the heart ; while rough words are just the reverse ; and if not the product of ill-temper, are very apt to produce it. The plainest of truths, let it be remembered, can be conveyed in civil speech, while the most maligaanant of lies may find utterance, and often do, in the language of the fish market.

Prejudice.—The following forcible and beautiful delineation of prejudice is ascribed to President Lincoln : " Prejudice may be compared to a misty morning in October ; a man goes forth to an eminence, and he sees at the summit of a neighboring hill a figure apparently of gigantic stature, for such the imperfect medium through which he is viewed would make him appear ; he goes forward a few steps, and the figure advances towards him : the size lessens as they approach ; they draw still nearer, and the extraordinary appearance is gradually, but sensibly, diminished ; at last they meet, and perhaps the person he took for a monster proves to be his own brother."

Poisoning Grain.—The Sacramento Union of the 22d inst., says it has received a notice that the grain now being threshed on the Pico grant, of Herman Wohler & Co., Ione Valley, has been poisoned. The informant states that he put four ounces of strychnine in the sacks. It seems strange (remarks the Bee. in copying the statement.) that a man should tell of such a deed, if he did do it. The object is evidently to spoil the sale of any grain belonging to Wohler. There has been a great deal of trouble between the grant-holders and the squatters in Ione Valley, and the author of the letter claims to be one of the injured fraternity.

Diffusion of Knowledge.—An intelligent class can scarce ever be, as a class, vicious ; never, as a class, indolent. The excited mental activity operates as a counterpoise to the stimulus of sense and appetite. The new world of ideas ; the new views of the relations of things ; the astonishing secrets of the physical properties and mechanical power disclosed, counterbalance the taste for frivolous or corrupt pleasure ; and thus, in the end, a standard of character is created in the community, which, though it does not invariably save each individual, protects the virtue of the mass.

A Bad Investment for a Life Insurance Company.—A French lady recently dece sed at Versailles, in her 107th year. It further appears in a statement recently made, that in 1822, being then in her 65th year, she effected a life contract with the General Life Insurance Company of Paris, by which she was to receive 4,000 francs annually on the puyment of 30,000 francs at the time of making the contract. This annual sum was punctually paid and amounted to 170,000 francs! The company must have taken a long breath when this apparently interminable existence was closed.

The San Leandro Gazette says that Dr. Pratt, of that town, has in his garden a cucumber-measuring fourteen inches in circumference and fifteen and a half inches in length, and is increasing in size every day.

The sixteenth anniversary of the arrival of the ship Humboldt will be celebrated by her resident passengers on Wednosday evening next.

Under date of Feb. 16th, 1865, Prof. Beames, the Musical Conductor, of New York, says : " I have had the pleasure of examining one of your new Grand Scale Square Piano Fortes, and I unhesitatingly state that it is in every particular the most magnificent of instruments ; the tone is most brilliant and beautiful both in quality and power, and I can truly say that I have never seen its equal. You deserve the highest possible success for giving to the public such superb instruments. I shall take great pleasure in recommending them to my pupils, and when opportunity offers play upon them in public.

CLARE W. BEAMES.

Mrs. Read's chest-expanders, skirt-supporters and other articles of ladies' toilet, exhibited at the Fair, should receive the attention of every lady visiting the exhibition. They are acknowledged as very essential aids to grace of form, convenience and health, by every lady who uses them.

The Nicholson Pavement is gaining favor in the community. Bush street, between Montgomery and Sansome, is being paved, and the sidewalks on the north side of the street are being laid with this, best of all pavements.

HUNT'S IMPROVED WIND-MILL.

THIS WIND-MILL IS RAPidly taking the place of all other Mills on the Pacific Coast. These Mills are so simple in their construction that, when once built, they can be put in order by almost any person; and when once in order they will run for years without repairs.
Prices, from $50 to $1,000.

ROUND AND SQUARE WATER TANKS BUILT TO ORDER.

HUNT'S PUMPS

Are admitted to be the best in the Market for Wind-Mills, being built expressly for that purpose. They can be set and taken apart with a common wrench, and are easily repaired.

HUNT'S ENDLESS CHAIN
HORSE-POWER
FOR SAWING WOOD.

Also, the
SELF-REGULATING HORSE-POWER

Is so arranged as to give a steady motion, and is calculated to be used for turning Wood, Iron or Brass, also for Scroll or Circular Sawing, and is fully equally to Steam for any light Work. The above Machines are built of the best materials, and made as durable as Wood and Iron will make them.

ALL WORK WARRANTED.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.
GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers through out the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Subscription Agent, Philadelphia.

RARE CHANCE
TO SECURE
DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,
HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass, and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

POOR FELLOW.

HE sat by the way, as the careless crowd scattered,
Oh, pitiful vision to see!
A poor crippled soldier all battered and shattered,
Both legs taken off at the knee!

And I said: "Noble fellow! How little is left him!
No blessing will come at his call;
The terrible bullet which cleft him bereft him
Of strength, hope, love, beauty—of all.

Yet stay! should he wish it"—my heart throbbing faster—
"I'll be his own true-hearted wife;
With me by his side he may master disaster,
And build up a beautiful life.

"His sorrow nipped early—his joy shall bloom later,
And I shall be proud of his scars;
This hero, thus marred by a traitor is greater Than any in gold lace and stars!"

"Dear sister"—a saucy voice said at my shoulder—
Mistakenly kind, oh, beware!
This man, with a load for one older and bolder,
Already has all he can bear!"

[Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE TRANS-ATLANTIC CABLE.

THE latest telegrams bring us news of the failure of the second attempt to lay the Atlantic Cable. The prospects of the undertakiug, were very judiciously stated by the London Post, in an article published on the 28th of June, from which we make the following extract:

"The process of laying the Atlantic Telegraph Cable is about to commence. There are several considerations touching the difficulties which have to be surmounted, and which it may be desirable to set in their proper light. One of the principal dangers by which the cable is threatened is described as consisting in abrupt and extensive variations in the surface of the ocean's bed. It is known that at some distance from the coast of Ireland there is a great increase in the depth of the Atlantic, and it was formerly believed that the steepness of the inclined plane stretching between the shallow water and the deep sea beyond was much greater than it really appears to be. The slope is now believed, from soundings which have been made, to be very gradual, and to extend over a distance of nearly a hundred miles, with a gentle descent of less than a hundred and fifty feet in a mile. But the condition of things on that part of the earth's surface which is covered with water is, we have every reason to believe, as different in its configuration from the portion which is covered with air as the latter is from the surface of the moon, where there is apparently no atmosphere at all, or at all events no such atmosphere as ours. Unless a submarine precipice were so abrupt that the cable would have to hang from its summit perpendicularly, or be stretched across from one mountain top to another, like the over-house telegraphs, it would, if cautiously paid out from the ship, easily accommodate itself to slopes of considerable steepness. The bed of the ocean is generally soft, and when once the cable had accommodated itself to the configuration of the surface, it would remain perfectly quiescent. There appear to be no currents at great depths, and the gravitation of the water would tend to maintain it in its position. The chief peril which the enterprise has to encounter is perhaps, after all, that of storms, which may deprive the crew of the Great Eastern of all command over their vessel. It is well calculated to impress even the proudest and most powerful with the consciousness of our impotence when we reflect that the success of so great and so useful a project—a project on which so much care has been bestowed and so much capital expended, and the moral and political consequences of which are so important and beneficial—depends chiefly upon the happy accident of uninterrupted fine weather during the few weeks that it is being executed. But all that could be done has been done, and the best season has been chosen for the voyage.

"KILL IT!"—Affected young lady, seated in a rocking-chair, reading the Bible, exclaims: "Mother, here's a grammatical error in the Bible!" Mother, lowering her specs, and approaching the reader in a very scrutinizing attitude, says: "Kill it! kill it! it 's the very thing that has been eating the book-marks."

In an important case recently tried in New York, the jury, after being out nearly an hour, came in and informed the court that one of their number knew nothing of the English language, and had not understood a word of the evidence, arguments, or charge of the judge. The court, after some hesitation, dismissed the jury.

STATISTICS.—One of those painfully idle animals called statisticians has discovered that the French Academy contains 5 octogenarians, 10 septuagenarians, 13 sexagenarians, 8 quinquagenarians, 3 quadragenarians, and that the total of the ages of all the academicians is 2,611 years.

FEMININE FASHIONS IN LIMA.

IT is probable that if those who formerly testified to a universal Limeña loveliness, could see the women in later fashions of dress, they would conclude that the saya-a-manto, the mysterious garment then worn, did much to shape their opinions. The interest felt in that unique dress may justify a description of it.

The name is composed of two substantive words, as the dress consists of two essential parts. The saya is a skirt hanging in apparently quilted folds from the waist nearly to the ground. In consequence of this quilting it is drawn in, or narrowed about the knees, so as to give an appearance of want of freedom in the use of the limbs, which, however, is more apparent than real, because of the elasticity of the skirt. The material of the saya is usually black silk. The manto, made of lighter material than silk, but also black, is attached to the saya at the waist behind and at its sides, whence it is brought up over the shoulders and head, concealing one arm entirely, which is folded up to hold the opposite sides of the manto together across the breast, and revealing only a part of the other arm, and the hand, which is raised for the purpose of drawing it over the face, leaving but one eye exposed. A well-turned arm and small hand, with taper fingers, adorned with brilliants, not more dazzling than the flashing eye, near which they loiter in coquettish mischief, show to great advantage in such a costume, and very naturally lead to the conclusion that all the unseen is in beautiful harmony. A gay colored shawl, usually crimson, is worn under the manto, and over the shoulders, covering the bust and falling in front, aiding by the bright reflection in beautifying the revealed arm and hand, always left exposed when the wearer is of pure Caucasian descent. Owing to the awkward appearance given to the figure by the contraction of the saya at the knee, and which gave to it also the name saya adjustada—drawn in—the Limeñas improved the style by opening out the skirt, letting it drop free and unconfined, and giving an air of greater ease and grace to the person, this being called in contradistinction saya despliegada. And thus it was worn until a few years since, convenient to the wearer for all artful purposes, and bewitching to the beholder—the chirimoya of dress—its captivating mysteries not to be described by language any more than the nectared sweets of that elysian fruit.

A few years since European fashions, under the skilful leadership of a few cunning beauties, began to make inroads upon the previously irresistible saya, which had placed the least favored in personal charms, provided she had but a bright eye, and understood the art of using it, on the same vantage ground with the loveliest. As in most important questions that have agitated the world, a compromise was the result, and the saya-a-manto is now supplanted by a large shawl, usually black, which the wearer throws over her head; and when it pleases her to be concealed it is drawn over the face from each side in such manner as to hide all but one eye, one end of the shawl being thrown carelessly over the shoulder after the manner of a Spanish cavalier's cloak. A Limeña is said to be tapada, and she is called tapada, when thus covered. The shawl thus worn answers all the purposes of concealment afforded by the manto, but is by no means as becoming. Indeed, so clumsy is it unless of a very fine and flexible material, and adroitly managed, and so troublesome to the wearer, that the prettier women, unembarrassed by the necessities of intrigue, are outwitting their less comely contemporaries, and with ready pretexts appear in public adorned as of old in the rich and courtly Spanish veil, and some of them even in that artful invention of modern millinery, the cunning little bonnet. It is refreshing to see this irresistible device of Parisian civilization, on the form, fit, color, and embellishment of which hang the hopes and happiness of nearly half the Caucasian race; and when, here in Lima, where it has not yet fully established its empire, it happens occasionally nearly to touch one's cheek as it flits by on the narrow footway, it brings thoughts of rosebuds and sweetness, pleasant thoughts and tender emotions.—Baxley.

WHAT ARE YOUR RELIGIOUS VIEWS?—About seven miles from Richmond I saw a man lying under the shade of a tree, assiduously chewing tobacco. After saluting him and asking several questions, to which I received lazy yeses and noes, I asked him to what churches the people in that neighborhood usually went. "Well, not much to any." "What are their religious views?" "Well, not much of any." "Well, my friend, what are your religious views?" I asked. The man answered slowly and sleepily: "My own 'pinion is, that them as made me 'll take care of me."

A TERRIBLE elephant is on the rampage in one of the provinces of Hindostan. He was walking in a marriage procession, but suddenly proceeded to pull up a few trees, and to pull down a house or two. On the next day he got worse, set his foot on a mahoot, smashed a Brahmin, punched a couple of kidmudgars, and frightened all the inhabitants of Kotulpore out of town.

THE LAW OF HONOR.—The feeling that prevailed under George III., was also strongly shown in the affair of the "Blueviad," a satirical poem on the "Blues," published in 1805 by a very young officer, who has since risen to social and professional distinction as a civilian. The officers came to a resolution to prosecute, and not to fight; but one of them, a captain who had joined in it, shook his whip at the satirist as they passed each other in Rotten-Row. This led to a challenge, which was refused on the score of the resolution, with the approval of six of the officers. The captain was forthwith posted, literally and actually, on large bills pasted against the walls, proclaiming him a coward. One of these met the eye of George III. "What, what, what? A captain in my household troops a coward? What are the Horse Guards about?" A court of inquiry sat, and every officer who had approved the captain's conduct in offering an affront for which he did not intend to be responsible was compelled to leave the regiment along with him. Elderly people who knew London society in their youth may remember a General T—— of the Guards, who was an assiduous and active frequenter of balls till past seventy. His affair with Theodore Hook shows how strictly the law of honor was once enforced. Overhearing the celebrated humorist, then a very young man, declaiming rather coarsely against waltzing, the general uttered a tart rejoinder, on which Hook grasped the collar of his coat, and flung or pushed him on one side with an expression of contempt. This took place in the hall of the house in which a ball had been given, as the company was breaking up. The general having taken no notice of the incident for two days, received a pretty broad hint that he must move in the affair, and eventually he screwed up his courage to the point of sending Hook a challenge through General A——. The excuse for delay was Hook's equivocal position in the world; and Hook, in telling the story, frankly owned that he did not know where to find a second. At length the thought struck him that he had better consult Colonel Reeve, an old friend of his father's, who, a little to his surprise, and much to his delight, undertook to act for him, stipulating that Hook should apologize after an interchange of shots. Hook consented, nothing loth, and the first fire having proved innocuous, was preparing for the apology, when General A—— stepped forward and delivered a written apology to him. The following day General T—— went to the Duke of York to report himself, and on mentioning what had occurred, was told that he had better leave the army. "If I leave the army, what am I to do?" was his very natural exclamation. To which the Duke of Cumberland (the King of Hanover,) who happened to be present, replied: "Why, turn dancing master, and be —— to you."

A FUNNY COURT SCENE.—A funny scene, and one not altogether in accordance with the chapter of the code regulating the duties of Justice of the Peace, was presented in a Justice's Court, not ten miles from the city of Dubuque, the other day.

A man was brought before the Squire to be tried for assault and battery. Now, be it remembered that the said Squire has an ardent love of the "craythur," and when his "love" is indulged to any extent, he is out-spoken, and betrays the "leanings" in the trial of a case.

Well the principal witness for the prosecution was called in the above trial. He proceeded to tell his story:

"I was going along the street," said he, "and I saw the plaintiff standing near the curb-stone. The defendant came up to him, looked at him a second, and then struck him a square blow and knocked him over."

"Bully for him! Bully for him!" shouted the Justice, in evident delight. "That's what I like to see, a square blow."

The counsel and spectators were amazed, and sat looking at the delighted Justice like statues; then three or four of them burst into a laugh.

"Order in the court," cried the Squire. "This court must be respected in a proper manner. Proceed with your case, gentlemen."

"Well, but your honor," said the counsel for the prosecution, "I'd like to know what kind of a proceeding this is. How can we try this case under such circumstances? Your honor knows"—

"Order in the court," roared the Squire. "Gentlemen, proceed with the case. I am glad it was a square blow he struck him!" he continued, ending the sentence in a hearty laugh.

Of course the prosecution "rested" here, and well they might. The "square blow" had settled their hash in that Court. The defence offered their testimony, and the Justice dismissed the case.—Dubuque Times.

EXPLORATION OF AFRICA.—Dr. Livingstone is about proceeding upon an exploration to the district between the north of Lake Nyassa and the south of Lake Tanganyka. As British Consul to the native races of Eastern Africa, he has a salary of £500 a year. A private friend has paid £1,000 towards the new expedition, the Royal Geographical Society promise £500, and the Foreign Office will give as much more.

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

ON Thursday last a remarkable poem, with the following heading, appeared in the Flag:

CRITICS AND RHYMERS.

BY ONE OF THE "FLAG'S POETS."

[The following is good-naturedly inscribed to those critical geniuses of the "purely literary press" who would, if they could, emulate the excellence of "THE FLAG'S Poets." Not possessing the requisite strength of wing to soar that high, they fly low, and chipper right enviously:]

"We that have free souls, it touches us not." "One of the Flag's poets" (Heavens! imagine the strength of mind a man must have to call himself "one of the Flag's poets"!) does not mean us We appreciate the Flag's poets, and only last week called attention to that sweet thing by "Andy Eh." "Let the gulled jade wince." We never strive to emulate the excellence of the Flag's poets—we confess we couldn't do it. "One of the Flag's poets" proceeds to give a sample of the sort of thing which makes these critics "chipper right enviously" because they cannot "soar that high." We cut a specimen inch and a half out of the middle:

> "Far be it from this recreant pen of mine
> To gild a phrase or trip a honeyed line;
> Let candor reign! let truth ut once declare
> What in her presence seems most good and fair!
> Let falsehood flaunt, let wholesale error win
> Her little day from out the babbling din
> Of each grand show where critics make their way,
> And furnish music while "the kitteas play!"
> Far be it from this recreant pen of mine
> To gild a phrase or trip a honeyed line;
> Dethrone the earth-worm, or the moth despise,
> Because, forsooth! a winged Psyche flies!

Didn't "one of the Flag's poets" think he'd just done it when he wrote—

> "Far be it from this recreant pen of mine
> To gild a phrase or trip a honeyed line"?

He had to put that in twice. We are sorry to observe that his recreant pen has tripped several honeyed lines, or at least played the mischief with their poor feet, making them halt very badly; for instance, the second of these three lines:

> Each bird will have his song, each clown his day,
> Each play applauders, each charlatan his claim,
> Each wit his jest, and each grand quack his fame.

This one of the Flag's poets is modest; he says:

> "O Shade of Sappho! let a burning strain
> Ring one full tone along the Western main!
> The fine-strung nerve and ear too long are jarred
> With non-idea'd rhyming by the yard!" *

He then gently hints that the "burning strain" is his poem; it is a considerable strain. The * attached to the last line directs attention to this note: "This line is especially intended for the 'Bohemians,' and especially not intended for the Flag's poets." "One of the Flag's poets" does not jar our ears with non-idea'd rhyming by the yard; his strain only measures nine inches and a half—little over half a foot—including introduction and foot-note. We did not discover an idea, but there might have been one somewhere. We are rejoiced that that much maligned class, "the Flag's poets," have found one among their number bold enough to throw down the gauntlet by writing a burning strain and challenging the Bohemians to equal it. We have given up that sort of thing, and shall not enter the lists, but we could soar "that high," if we liked; we did once—in a little poem in praise of Messrs. Lockwood & Hendrie's suits for boys—and probably could do it again, but the inducements offered are not sufficient.

WE are always happy to give information on any subject when it lies in our power to do so, as any one who noticed our frantic effort to answer that question about "monkey on the heart," must be aware. We are therefore most happy to give the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle the information which he seeks, though, at the same time, we must own we are somewhat surprised at such a request coming from such a quarter; for, be it known, this editor is a classical scholar, a professor of languages, and a most accomplished gentleman. In the kindness of our heart we warned him that he would certainly hurt his fingers some day if he persisted in pulling our "Mouse-Trap" about, but he would not heed our advice, and now he has done it:

"Information Wanted.—Will the acute, critical, and classical "Mouse-Trap" man of THE CALIFORNIAN be good enough to inform us why, in the proverbial saying, "Parturiunt montes; nascetur ridiculus mus," he writes "nascetur" for "nascatur," and upon what authority he substitutes the future of the verb for the present?"

Will we inform you why we write "nascetur?" Certainly, with much pleasure. Because this "proverbial saying" was written by the Latin poet Horace, and he writes "nascetur" instead of "nascitur," as the classical editor of the Dramatic Chronicle may ascertain by referring to the epistle entitled "De Arte Poetica," of which this sentence, which has since become proverbial, forms the 139th line. "By what authority?" We can give the authority of the Cambridge edition, published by Thos. Kidd, A. M., of Trinity College, 1817, the Latin and English edition by the Reverend Mr. Philip Francis; Dublin, A. Leathly and J. Exshaw, 1764. "Authority?" Nay, for fear of allowing our classical mouse any hole by which to escape, we will refer him to the Delphine edition, A. J. Valpy, London, 1825. We believe from the Delphine edition there is no appeal. Lest our editor should wish for still more authority, let him refer to "Quotations from Foreign Languages" in the last edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, for, wonderful to relate, even Webster, whose Latin in the early editions of his dictionary was not at all safe to swear by, positively quotes this correctly. We, with Horace, prefer the use of the future tense as expressing something which will happen: "The mountains are in labor; a ridiculous mouse will be brought forth." The editor will observe that, as soon as the mouse is born ("nascitur") the laboring of the mountains ceases, therefore the verb is most properly in the future, will be born, ("nascetur,") as expressing what will be the result of the mountains being in labor. We devote so much space to giving this information, hoping that the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle asked it in good faith, and was not laboring under the idea that we were ever in the habit of misquoting either Latin or English authors; if he did he has made a very poor attempt. We, who edit the "Mouse-Trap," should certainly not be likely to make any mistake about a mouse—ridiculous or otherwise. If the editor wished to find and expose to contempt a ridiculous mus in our "Mouse-Trap, we fear the result of his labor will scarcely prove satisfactory to him. However, he is heartily welcome to the information which he has asked us to give him, and we trust that he will continue to keep a sharp eye on the "Mouse-Trap;" but he must not set his dog-Latin to catch our respectable Horatian mouse.

WE are an independent set of people in San Francisco, and do things in our own way without regard to the manner in which the rest of the world act. Public men generally have dinners given in their honor; the Chinese merchants invited Colfax to a dinner; the young gentlemen of San Francisco invited him to a dance—grand ball in honor of the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives. That's how we manage it in San Francisco; we wonder whether Mr. Colfax there saw the solid men of California whirling in the giddy mazes of the waltz, and met the leading politicians of the State in a perspiring condition from the effects of a gallop. This was perhaps not dignified, but it pleased the young gentlemen, and Mr. Colfax, who is a kind-hearted man, accepted the invitation, no doubt, as he might accept one from a party of young Americans to join in a game at base-ball—to please the youngsters.

WE are really grieved and surprised that the following entry in the list of shipping arrivals at this port has not attracted the attention of the daily press:

"Schr Hannah Louise, Mason, 48 hours from Point New Year; lumber, to Waddell & Co.

What does that mean? Who are Waddell & Co? Why, Captain Waddell and the pirates of the Shenandoah who are burning our whalers up North, very likely. How do we know that he isn't out of coal, and this lumber isn't consigned to him for fuel. It may not be, but then on the other hand it may. Eternal vigilance is the price of safety. Why did not the Call which discovered that gun—no, yeast powder—stored in Sacramento, call the attention of the authorities to this suspicious consignment? Waddell & Co! may be all right, but it looks suspicious, very suspicious.

THE last name on the Democratic ticket is E. J. Chase:

> The chase is up, the chase is up,
> The pack is in full cry,
> The scent is warm, the riders bold
> O'er fences seem to fly.
> The Monroe Doctrine—five-barred gate—
> Is cleared with one bold hound,
> The hapless nigger on the fence,
> Lies sprawling on the ground.
> Still faster speed the gallant throng—
> Their leader turns his face—
> "We're hunting nothing, boys," he cries,
> "We've all outstripped the Chase."
> The pack should sure pursue the chase,
> And Chase should lead the pack,
> The head man (Shaw)re will find this true,
> When he, too late, looks back

POOR Felix O'Byrne has been persecuted again, and this time the Flag did not come to his defence. Poor Felix! he was worse off than Lazarus, for the dogs came and licked his sores. As in the Enquiry, so in the Court Martial, voracity and lack of veracity appear to have been the cause of the trouble. Felix is charged with omitting to pay money which he owed for subsistence stores, and then telling stories, just as restaurant keepers accused him before of not paying for his subsistence stores. Then they say he took a horse out of a stable, without the permission of the owner, and told stories about that; but, in justice to Felix, we must state that he did not eat the horse. Felix is to have another trial—as if the poor fellow had not had trials enough already! How many more trials the infelix O'Byrne will bear, without succumbing, is hard to say; his next, which will probably be his last, (by the military authorities,) will come upon him on Monday next, and may the Lord have mercy on his soul—that is, provided he has such an article about him.

THE reporter of the Call has evidently a highly poetical imagination. He relates how the school children visited the Fair and gazed: "their young eyes with wonder dilated, first at the glittering piles, and then at the vast airy fabric that rose around them,

> ——a temple such as mortal hand
> Has never built, nor ecstacy, nor dream,
> Reared in the cities of enchanted land."

Good gracious! We wonder whether the reporter didn't steal that from some London penny-a-liner's description of the Crystal Palace, and think it would do just as well for the misshapen old wooden shanty on Union Square. That young man is in a bad way; he ought really, if he has any regard for his mental health, to go through a course of commercial reporting. Listen to him:

"The air was filled with the merry ring of their voices, the gay laugh and expressions of wonder as they slipped joyously from object to object—here admiring some fanciful pictures, there drinking in the magic tones that flowed from a piano like murmurs of the enchanted wine, or notes in a silver shower. Little folks, turned loose at these exhibitions with unclipped wings, heighten the charm and give a festival air."

"Murmurs of enchanted wine!" What sort of tipple is that? How can "notes" fall in a "silver shower" before they are cashed? It's really dreadful. If that poor dear young man does not have a care over himself, he will find himself in Stockton or writing poetry for the Flag!

"LE VOLEUR," published in Paris, is not a smart paper. Its title, "The Thief," and its heading, which represents a man surrounded by papers, and, underneath, the words, "Il compilait, il compilait, il compilait," "He compiles, he compiles, he compiles," denote that it depends almost entirely on pickings and stealings from other papers, but yet it need not omit making a point in the little original matter which it publishes, when it temptingly offers itself. In a paragraph in which it states that Napoleon's Life of Cæsar has given rise to quite a taste for ancient history, and notices a new work entitled Gladioteurs, it says: "The arena was the turf of the Romans during the existence of the Empire; a man longed to be the owner of a gladiator as now-a-days he longs for a race-horse." It actually has the stupidity to omit paying a compliment to the owner of Gladiateur, the winner of the English Derby and the Grand Prize of Paris, by saying that his Gladiateur had proved the noblest Roman of them all, that many a man, even at the present day, sighed to become owner of a Gladiateur—or something of that kind.

A LION-TAMER attached to a Combination Circus, while "taming" with a cowhide a refractory lioness in Terre Haute, lately, had several fingers gnawed off. Though fond of notoriety, he objects to being lionized—in that way.—Exchange.

Why didn't he knock the brute on the head when he found it a gnawing?

TREM

MAKING FREE WITH A CHIEF.

IT was almost all over with the Chariot of Fame, A 1 at Lloyd's for thirteen years, and two thousand tons burthen. Captain Barclay said so. Sam Johnsou, the first mate, said so. All the crew agreed with Captain Barclay and Sam Johnson. Only Heaven knew where we were; save that we knew too well that we were off a nasty coust on a dirty night. A brazen sunset had brought on a three days' hurricane, and there we were, the pumps clogged, the crew worn out with working at the pumps, the hold full of water, the bulwarks washed away, laboring in the trough of a yeasty sea, and every plank creaking and groaning at if its heart were breaking. It was a pitch-dark September night, and we could not see eveu the bare poles against the sky; and even with the night-glass we could make out uo coast, though we all of us pretty well knew that we should be on a lee shore in a few hours, if the wind did uot go down, and the vessel answer her helm a little better.

It was about three bells, as near as may be, when Captain Barclay, a respectable God-fearing man as ever came out between the dock gates, called me dowu into his cabin.

"Martingale," says be. "you being supercargo, are not called upon to work at the pumps, no more thau you are called upon to dip your hauds iu the tar bucket; but you have doue it," says he, "and you're a brave honest fellow," (those were his very words.) "and I thank you you for it in the name of our employers; your life 's a valuable one to the ship, and I insist ou your turning iuto my berth—the sea breaks into yours—and sleeping till I call you when the dog watch comes on. No words, Martingale; turn in, and I'll tell the steward to bring you a stiff nor'wester."

I could not very well refuse, for I was wet through and worn out; so I thanked him, and turned in. He gave one look at a portrait of his wife that hung over the sofa in his cabin, took down his speakiug-trumpet from the brackets over his desk, wished me good uight, and went on deck agaiu.

Three minutes afterwards, the steward's boy came in with the cold grog; the constant seas that the vessel shipped having put out the galley fire.

"Where is Mr. Johnson, William?" I said to the boy.

"He is at the pumps, sir, aud he says he won't leave them till daybreak."

I drank the grog aud lay down. The wind was so tremendous that it drowned all other noises; but iu a moment I was dreaming of the old orchard at home in Lanark, and fancying myself listening to the burr of the old threshing machiue. The sea might roll mountains, the wind might plunge and struggle; but I was asleep and at rest. I suppose I must have slept six hours, for when I awoke the wind had gone down, and there was a dead calm and a sileuce so intense that I think it must have been that which awoke me. It was just daybreak, and the pale sunlight fell softly aud cheerfully on the cabin wall, lighting up the picture of the captain's wife. Vexed at having slept so long, I leaped up, dressed as I was, and listened. Not a sound, no noise of deck-cleaning, no patter of bare feet, no hearty cries, no pacing, no clattering of plates in the cabin. I was out of my berth in a moment and washed my face. The fore-cabin was an inch deep in water, and the stairs were strewn with tangled ropes. I was up in three strides. Gracious heaven! till the last day I I have to live, I shall never forget how my heart beat at the momeut that I set foot on deck and saw that I was there, alone.

Yes, alone. There was not a soul left ou board. A straw hat and a telescope lay by the wheel, but the wheel itself was broken and useless. By the galley door hung a tarpaulin coat aud au axe, beside a shattered spar, a cask, and a pile of torn canvass. As I fell on my knees in the utter despair of that momeut, I heard a stout hearty voice cry from high above: "Harry Martingale, belay there! I'm up aloft, overhauling the top hamper."

I looked, aud, to my intense delight, saw the well-known face of Sam Johnson beaming down ou me from the cross-trees. In a momeut he was on deck at my side.

"This is bad bnsiuess," I said; "but they are not all gone, Sam?"

"Every man Jack, Harry," said he. "We were all at work cuttiug away spars an hour ago, when there came a great washing sea aud broke over us; it licked 'em all up, and carried over every soul on 'em, Harry—captain, doctor, down even to the very steward's boy. Goue before you could say 'Jack Robinson;' but there! It is no use crying for spilt milk. He was a good captain, and they were good messmates; but they 're gone, and I thank God for sparing us. Where were you at that time? I thought you'd gone with the rest. Well, I 'm glad to see you, old boy; but come, we must bear a hand, for I tell you the craft is going down by the head as fast as she can settle."

It didn't do to waste time in talking at moments like that, so we set to, got a good bag of biscuit each, a revolver, soue bullets, powder and caps, filled a flask with brandy, and theu prepared to go ashore. For there lay the shore on the starboard bow; a long low line of sand-bank, with a few scrubby trees here and there in the hollows, but no cliffs or trees to mention. It was not two hundred yards off, yet in my delight at finding Sam Johuson alive, I had not before turned my eyes that way.

"I am sure there are natives," said Sam, "for from the cross-tree I could see smoke rising over the scrub timber to the west."

How to get on shore was the point. At last Sam and I decided to lash a rope crossways round a likely cask which lay near the mast, aud probably contained salt pork; and then, tying ourselves to it, to guide it with two rough paddles that I had cut out of the oars of the captain's gig. There was a streng ground swell, rolliug in, green and bright, and the surf soon washed us in high and dry, cask and all.

When we turned and looked around. be hanged if the old Chariot of Fame hadn't gone down! All that was left of her was two or three big spars that wandered about in a helpless sort of inquiring way, and finally floated out of sight round the next headland.

"There goes a nice mouthful for the underwriters!" said Sam. He theu took up a big stone to beat in the head of our pork cask, for, says he: "We shall want a snack, Harry, about noon, and this junk and some fresh shell-fish, with a sip of brandy, will be a tidy meal enough."

We ponnded away, and at last got the head of the cask off, aud when we got the head off, how our jaws dropped to find it was not pork but rosin! Now, a man can't live on rosin, aud as for myself I felt ready to sit down and blubber.

"I'll be hanged," says Sam, after kickiug the cask about in a rage, like a football. for ten minutes, "if I don't go and overhaul that village! You come with me, Harry. We can't spend all our lives on a sea-shore, eating rosiu and mussels; besides, the mussels in these outlandish places ain't like the Liverpool mussels."

Off we weut, and sure enough, in about a mile, we saw some huts in a clump of gum-trees, and beyond them a forest stretchiug as far as you could see, here and there opening out into greeu places like parks, theu closing up again into woods.

Well, on we went, Sam first, for he was a better walker than I was, aud when we reached the first hut he ran forward and looked through the chinks.

He came back on tiptoe, motioning me to be quiet, makiug faces like a clown, aud stopping his mouth to prevent laughing.

"By the living jingo!" said he, "Harry, I don't know what sort of niggers we've got amougst; but, whatever they are, here's their dancing crib."

I stole on tiptoe to look. Sure enough, there were some sixty niggers, men and women, with uothing particular ou them except their great mops of oily black hair, and belts of strips of mattiug, rigged out for a regular dance.

The master of the ceremonies, who had his back turned to us, was dressed in the costume of 1830—long cinnamon-colored swallow-tailed coat, frilled shirt, pumps, and claret-colored pantaloons. Over this, he wore a soft of 'possum skiu cloak, and he carried a sort of long white wand in his hand.

"Take your place, gentlemen, for a cotillon, La Mignonette Française; now all at ze once."

Here the fiddler struck up, and the sixty niggers began to dance and jabber, every other word sounding like "Golly, golly;" which is the name, therefore, which they went by henceforth with Sam Johnson. All the time the man with the violin went on dancing like a madman among them, aud shouting: "Ladies, moulinet to the right. Each couple allemande to the left. Now La Grande Change. La Promenade. Chasse. Balance. Retour du Char. Tail of ze cat. Rigadoon. Pousette. Now ze great Round. Ver well."

Presently up runs a nigger from the shore and brought out the dancing-master, who very soon passed close to us, followed by all the niggers. We could see him now quite well; he was a tall, lean old nankeen-colored Frenchman, with thin long legs and a cat-like face, remarkable for his hollow lantern cheeks, sunken eyes, and promiuent cheek-bones, all crowned by a curly Brutus wig, very dusty, and almost worn out.

We followed them at a distance, aud hid behind a tree, from a spot where we could see all he did. As soon as the nigger who had brought the news led him to the cask, and he had stooped dowu aud examined it, he gave a sort of shriek, took out a lump ol the rosin, scraped his fiddle bow, and began dancing.

"Ladies, chain!" he cried, and away they went dancing round the cask as if they were all gone mad.

"They are as mad as March hares," said I. "Sam, I can't stand it any longer. I must speak, for there is no doubt about one thing, and that is, that the lubber is a civilized Christian, for he knows how to dance."

So out we stepped and walked straight up to the lubber, and told him about our vessel and how we were cast away. But the man didn't answer a word at first, he was so surprised.

"There, he doesn't know your lingo after all, Sam," said I; "do it by deaf and dumb signs." Then I tried him with the deaf and dumb alphabet, and went through a sort ol ballet to show that we had been cast on shore, were hungry, and wanted a night's shelter.

"What for you make zose faces, gentlemen matelots," he said, breaking out all at once; "you are welcome to what I have of mine, what for you play ze fool? Come, I will tell you of my news at ze village."

In less than half hour Sam and I were quite at home in the village, telling him of our shipwreck, and listening to our entertainer's own story over three stiff glasses of brandy-and-water, to which both our flasks contributed.

Our host, by name M. Hyacinthe Isidore Gallini, was, it appeared, a French dancing-master who had been wrecked on the coast twenty-years ago, about 1830; my story dates 1850. Gradually he had learnt their lingo, and ingratiated himself in their favor.

"I taught zem," he said, "gentlemen, to Balance and Rigadoon, Allemaude, Mouliuet. I taught zem Le Monlinet, Le Bouquet, La Rose, La Fantasie Liegeoise—all ze fashionable cotillions that would civilize aud amuse zem. I taught zem all ze words of my language that related to my favorite art. I taught zem ze quadrille to perfection. They loved and honored me for this; zey called me ze great Topinambow, which is their word for ze priest. They made me zeir king, and gave me zeir great mystery, ze petrified chief, to guard. I rule zem. I teach zem ze dances, which have become part of zeir religion, and the words and the directions in ze French and English. They look upon me as dropped from Heaven to teach zem cotillions. If I had not dance they wonld have killed me long ago. Ma foi, how I have taught zem to poussette; ma foi, how zey moulinet! Come, mes enfauts. I will show you ze petrified chief that this nigger people worship.

"Belay there! A petrified nigger," whispered Sam to me, as we followed Gallini; "wouldn't that please them at home, messmate?"

"Quiet, Sam," said I, observing something queer about his face as he spoke to me; and ou we weut, following Gallini to the place.

We soon came to the spot: it was a cave in a sandstone rock, so deep and dark that we had to enter it with lighted torches. The walls were covered with lantastic figures ot meu fighting, uncouth monsters, winged dragons, and all those sort of things you may see on siguboards and state coaches.

At the extreme end of the cave lay the petrified chief, his face painted with vermilliou, aud his hair as like oakum as could be. There was a boomerang in his right hand, and a carved wooden club in his left; a pair of sailor's trousers was tied in a kuot round his neck, and the rest of his body was wrapped in 'possum skins.

"It's as like our carpenter as one marling-spike's like another," said Sam to me, with a covetous look about his eyes.

Whether we did not admire the chief enough, I don't know, but from that time Gallini seemed always jealous ot and tried to set the niggers against us; while we did, on the other hand, all we could to show them that we were worth as much as the old dancing-master.

Sam one day put out the glory of his cotillions lor ever, by suddenly shouting out "Belay there!" and dashing into a hornpipe, such a one as even Wapping would have rejoiced at—a regular toe and heel, pulling and hauling hornpipe, with shivering trousers, hand in the side, shout, and everything complete.

The niggers were in raptures, and insisted on sacrificing a goat at the door of our tent in honor of Sam; upon which he rushed out, carried it off, and cooked it for his own dinner.

Gallini was going down as fast as mercury in rainy weather. We had all the songs and dancing now to ourselves, and we could not move without processious and sacrifices, which always ended well for Sam and me.

One day Sam aud I cleaned up our revolvers and got our powder aud bullets, and set to shooting at a calabash—just to frighten the niggers, and show them what fire-arms were. They leaped about like mad people when we hit the mark, as we took care to do every time, for I was behind the tree where the calabash hung, and if Sam missed I ran out and poked a hole in it before they could come up. They wanted to make us both kings, but Sam aud I wonldu't have anythiug to do with it. You see, we had a different game ou hand.

The night of the shooting, Gallini came and wanted to buy our pistols, but we wouldn't sell them; then he wanted to buy all our clothes to cut up into pantaloons and swallow-tailed coats; when we refused that too, he left in a rage, swearing at us in French.

Directly he left, Sam came up to me as if he wanted to whisper, and said, "Harry, that Frenchman don't mean us any good, and the sooner we cut it the better. But I tell you I'm not a-going away without that petrified nigger. He'd make our fortune in the old country. Harry, are you game? lor if so, the sooner we set to work the better."

"Never put off a good thing, Sam," said I; "here's my hand."

As soon as it was dark, off we went to the cave. Taking a horse to the entrance, we brought out the petrified nigger and tied him firm on it. Then we collected some grub in a bag, and struck off on the road leading to what we had been told was the nearest settlement on the Wullah-Nullah river. We calculated, that if we could make a thirty miles' march ahead, we should be pretty safe; we had tied up our hut so as to look as if we were asleep and did not want to be disturbed.

Off we started across a wild prairie half saudholes and half scrub. By the time the moon rose, we got safe under cover in a forest of gum-trees, through which we had ascertained our track lay.

There was just room for the horse along the native road between the trees, and there was no sound except now and then the scream of some bird far over our heads that our talking awoke, or the fall of some huge branches that now and then dropped with the noise of thunder, and seemed to shake all the forest:

"My eyes, Harry," said Sam, "if I think we shall ever get out again with our mummy! I only wish we'd got him passed clean through the Customs."

"They'll raise our hair if they catch us," said I. "I think, Sam, we'd better drop the stone nigger, both get on the horse, and push on as fast as we can for the nearest township."

"No, no," said Sam; "I'll never let go of this nigger. Only let me get him home to the Minories, and my fortune's made."

I wasn't going to quarrel with a messmate, so I gave in, and when the moon went down we halted till daybreak, slept by turns, took a meal, and reloaded the horse.

We had just got our traps tied on at daybreak, and all snug under hatches, when I found that that rascal Gallini, or some nigger he had employed, had stolen our pistols.

The second night we had just a mile or so to get clear of the timber, and were beginning to think we were quite safe, when the beast of a horse fell lame and gave in.

"He's shamming," said I.

"No," says Sam, looking at her from stem to stern in a hopeless way. "No, Harry," said he, "that craft's back's broken, and she's going down."

"Well," said I, "bear a hand then with the biscuit-bag, and leave the nigger to be his own tombstone."

Sam didn't answer for a moment; he was down on his knees, seeing if the red paint had at all rubbed off the mummy's face; then he rose up, and said in an awful deep voice to be sure, "No, Harry, no, not if I knows it. If you like to leave me on a lee shore, though I didn't expect it of you, do; but if I go, the stone nigger goes with me. Every one has his opportunity, as our ship carpenter used to say, and this is mine. The stone nigger and I keep together till we either get to Davy's locker, or the "Lively Whaler," in Ratcliffe Highway."

I was just going to tell him that we'd pull in the same boat whatever the weather was, when there came a cry from the wood behind us like the cry of a mad dog. Then, came two more cries, then three, then a dozen. Last of all, there came a sort of shaking howl that sounded like nothing but "Golly, golly, golly!" and grew louder every minute. It was the niggers after us. Presently, out they came across the prairie in a long black line like a pack of dogs, and ran straight at us with clubs and spears, knocking us both down with boomerangs, and stunning us.

When we came to, they were dancing cotillions round us, and chasséing and moulineting for joy at getting back their petrified chief. They had taken us back several miles to Gallini, and had lighted a fire to sleep round for the night. Presently, Gallini came to us, cursed us, pushed us about with his feet (for we were tied,) danced round us, and then told us that we were to be sacrificed early in the morning, in atonement to the great stone chief—as the niggers called the mummy. I don't suppose we had to thank him for much, but one of the black fellows brought us some victuals and left us.

By-and-by, the thieves, worn out with the chase they'd had, fell asleep round their fire. As soon as they were all sound, Sam nudged me, and, slipping his hands out of the ropes, drew his clasp knife out of his pocket, cut off his remaining tackling, and then cut mine.

"It's dirty weather with us," I whispered to Sam, "and there's such a sea round us, Sam, as no boat can live in."

"Never you mind," said he. "You bear a hand with the stone nigger. I saw some smoke, Harry, over those trees to the left, three hours ago, and that's what I'm going to make for."

Well, we went up to where the stone nigger was, and hoisting him between us, set off as quietly as we could in the direction where Sam had seen the smoke. The stone nigger was a heavy load, but we staggered on with him for half a mile, till we saw a fire and some men sitting round it. When we approached, they started up and seized their guns.

"Friends or enemies?" cried one of them.

"Friends, ahoy!" said Sam, letting down his end of the stone mummy as tenderly as if it was alive. "Friends! and Great Britons! Just got out of the hands of the bloodthirsty niggers."

"You're welcome," cried all the men; "we're Englishmen too. Come to our fire. We've got rifles enough here, to stop five hundred niggers; but what have you got there?"

"Well, it's a long yarn," said Sam, "to tell you what we're laden with. It's no baccy nor any smuggled goods, but as beautiful a stone nigger as ever you set eyes on."

Nothing could have been kinder than the explorers were, and in a few minutes there was Sam and I sitting by the fire on the petrified man, drinking our horns of grog, and singing:

"The heart of a true British sailor."

The explorers had pack-horses, and these bore the petrified man alternately. I and Sam made a good thing of exhibiting the chief in the settlement, and then we shipped him in the Happy Return for England, where we did still better. And those who want to see him, and hear our story fuller and better told, had better come and call on us at No. 14, Davis street, New Cut, where the stone nigger is now exhibiting with great success at twopence a head.

A "NOVEL" SUIT.

THE Continental correspondent of the American Literary Gazette says: "M. Alexandre Dumas has appeared before our courts as the defendant in an interesting suit to determine the liberties which writers may take with historical persons. The dramatic episode in the life of Marie Antoinette (which was so full of dramatic episodes,) known as the 'Journey to Varennes,' tempted M. Dumas. He made it the theme of a novel. It happened that a M. de Prefontaine, a chevalier de St. Louis, and a half-pay major, was drawn into this history. He lived at Varennes, and, either by accident or design, he opened his door when the carriages drove up. It was half-past eleven o'clock at night. Count de Moustier (one of the body-guards who accompanied the royal party) had got out of the carriage to find somebody who would point out to him the road from Varennes to Stenay. Perceiving a light and an open door, M. de Moustier made for them, but the door was instantly closed. M. de Moustier burst it open. Let me quote M. de Moustier's narrative: 'Thereupon a man appeared and asked what was wanted. The reply made was: 'To ask you to show me the road leading out of town towards Stenay.' The man said: 'I would do so willingly, but I should be hanged if it was known.' M. de Moustier observed that he was too well-bred not to do everything to serve a lady. He answered: 'We know all about it; it is no lady.' Thereupon M. de Moustier abruptly broke off conversation to let the king know what had taken place. The king ordered him to return and bid the man come to his majesty. M. de Monstier went back and said: 'My mistress has charged me to beg you come and talk with her.' This man dared not absolutely disobey; he went to the carriage bare-foot, so as to make less noise. He got up to the carriage steps, and after talking a moment with her majesty, he led M. de Monstier to the commandant of the detachment of Lauzun's Hussars, who was living at the Cordeliers' Convent at Varennes. This officer was not at his post. No one was there but a single hussar, who said he had orders to join the commandant at one o'clock A. M., if he failed to appear at Varennes. The man who acted as M. de Moustier's guide was named Préfontaine; he was a major of cavalry, and a knight of the royal and military order of St. Louis. As it is reported that he, with so many others, has since made numerous commentaries on the king's arrest, and has boasted that if the king had listened to him and had followed his advice he would have escaped, M. de Moustier owes it to the truth to declare that the only service which M. de Prefontaine rendered, or was willing to render to his unfortunate masters, was simply to lead him, M. de Moustier, to the residence of the commandant of Lauzun's Hussars. He would add that he never saw so timid or so pusillanimous a man as this man; that in the very slight and perfectly useless good office, which he could scarcely refuse to do his sovereign, he pushed precautions to the extremest limits, and that he did not cease to recommend to M. de Moustier secrecy in regard to his movements, saying they would compromise and ruin him if they were known. Should a decorated soldier reckon any risks or perils? In these circumstances, what is fortune compared with honor? What is this life, when the question is to save his king's existence? This man, after this moment, did not once again appear before the king until his majesty's departure from this detestable Varennes.'

"The family of de Préfontaine protest against the narrative of M. de Moustier, and appeal, to support their protest, to the narrative of M. de Valory, the second body-guard, who accompanied their majesties, and who, in his memoirs, says: 'The house of the respectable M. de Prefontaine might have served as the refuge for the relays, which were prepared, had he been previously informed and taken into the secret.' M. Alex. Dumas preferred to Valory's narrative that of Moustier, because the latter was present and was an actor in the scene, while Valory had been sent forward to gain what information he could; but the novelist confuses the names and represents M. de Vallory as giving his arm to the fugitive queen, whom he represents knocking at the major's door. M. Dumas dramatizes Moustier's narrative by putting it in the form of a dialogue. Vallory says: 'Sir, we are going to Stenary; will you be good enough to indicate the road to us?' 'But if I do that, I shall be compromised.' 'Even if you do compromise yourself, you will not hesitate to do this service for a lady who is in a dangerous situation.' 'Sir, the lady behind you is not merely a lady—it is the queen.' M. de Valory tried to deny it. The queen drew him back, saying: 'Let us lose no time in discussion; go tell the king I am recognized.' M. de Valory hastened to the carriage and in a few words told the king what had taken place. The king said: 'Ask that man to come and speak to me.' The man obeyed, and advanced to the carriage door, not without marks of lively apprehension. 'What is your name?' 'De Prefontaine, sire.' 'Who are you?' 'Cavalry Major, knight of the royal and military order of St. Louis.' 'As major, and as knight of St. Louis, you twice took an oath to be faithful to me. It is, consequently, your duty to aid me in the embarrassment in which I am.' The major stammered a few words; the queen stamped her foot impatiently. The king added: 'Sir, have you heard whether the hussars and relay-horses expected a treasure which was to pass through Varennes?' 'I did hear so, sire.' 'Where are these hussars? Where are these horses?' 'In the Low-town, sir. The officers are lodging at the Hotel du Grand Monarque.' 'I thank you. Now you may return home. Nobody has seen you, nobody has heard you, consequently no harm will befall you.' The major profited by the permission and returned home. The de Prefontaine family moved the court to order M. Dumas to insert the extract from M. de Valory's memoirs in the next edition of this novel. The lower court granted the desired order; but the appellate court reversed this judgment upon the ground thas M. Dumas was at liberty to give preference to Moustier's narrative, and that he faithfully followed it in substance.

MODERN CHURCH MUSIC.—"Doesticks" has communicated to the Detroit Advertiser some of his experience in New York. Having exhausted the amusements of the theatre, the opera, the museum, and the concerts, he tried the church. The following is his account of the music: "Pretty soon music—organ—sometimes grand and solemn, but generally lively enough for a contra dance. B. D. said the player got a big salary to show off the organ, and draw a big house. He commenced to play the Old Hundred. At first, majestic as it should be, but soon his left hand began to get unruly among the bass notes, then the right cut up a few monkey shines in the treble; left threw in a large assortment of quavers; right led off with a grand flourish and a few dozen variations; left struggled mournfully to keep up, but soon gave up dead beat, and after that went back to first principles, and hammered away religiously at Old Hundred in spite of the antics of its fellow; right struck up a march—marched into a quick step—quick step into a gallop; left still kept at Old Hundred; right put in all sorts of fancy extras, to entice the left from its sense of propriety; left still unmoved; right put in a few bars of a popular waltz; left wavers a little; right strikes up a favorite polka; left evidently yielding; right dashes into a jig; left now fairly deserts his colors and goes over to the enemy, and both commence an animated hornpipe, leaving poor Old Hundred to take care of itself. At length with a crash, a squeak, a rush, a roar, a rumble, and an expiring groan, the overture concluded and the service began. At length, with another variette upon the organ, and all the concentrated praise and thanksgiving of the congregation, sung by four people, the service concluded. I thought from the manner of the last performance, each member of the choir imagined the songs of praise would never get to Heaven if he didn't give them a personal boost in the shape of an extra yell."

A BOHEMIAN REASON FOR IDLENESS.—M. Edmund About, tells the following characteristic story of Henri Murger: "One day I met him in front of the Varietes Theatre. I spoke to him, asked how he was, and I ended by the inevitable question between literary men: 'What are you at work on? Why is it that you have given us nothing to read and nothing to applaud this long time?' He replied with melancholy sang froid: 'Why? I will tell you. 'Tisn't literature, it is arithmetic. I owe 4000f. to Mme. Porcher, the Providence of dramatic authors; 2000f. to the Moniteur, and 1500f. to the Revue des Deux Mondes. Follow attentively my reasoning. If I bring out a play, my excellent friend Mme. Porcher will pay herself, and I shall not see a cent of the copyright; if I give a novel to the Moniteur, I shall have to write twenty feuilletons before I shall have paid my debt; were I to contribute an article to the Revue des Deux Mondes, after it had printed and published my forty-eight sheets, it would say to me, 'Now we are even.' So you see that it would be unpardonable prodigality were I to do any such thing; and I have at last determined to be a methodical fellow; therefore, I have resolved to do nothing, to avoid spending my money, and I am lazy—from economy.'"

STORIES FOR GOOD LITTLE GIRLS.

THE STORY OF MARY HARRIS.

MARY HARRIS was a lit-tle girl who lived in Chi-ca-go. She was a very pret-ty lit-tle girl, and one day an old bach-e-lor fell in love with her. So he used to write fine letters to her and call her "Rose-bud," and "Puss," and "Lit-tle Mol-lie." But he went to Wash-ing-ton and got mar-ri-ed, and soon for-got his "Lit-tle Mol-lie." When Mary Har-ris heard the news she bought a pret-ty pis-tol and went to Wash-ing-ton too. There she found the old bach-e-lor in a big build-ing, which they called the Treas-ur-y De-part-ment. So she went up to him and shot him with the pret-ty pis-tol. The bul-let went into the old bach-e-lor. This made him feel bad and he died. Then Mary Har-ris cried, for she was a good girl and very affec-tion-ate. Then the Sec-re-tary came to see Mary Har-ris, and pit-ied her very much. Then the ed-it-ors came to see her, and pit-ied her very much. For Mary Har-ris was very pret-ty and so affec-tion-ate. And the jailors of the pris-on all pit-ied her, and the judg-es, and the jury that tried her, and the lawyers all pit-ied lit-tle Mary Har-ris. So they let her go free, and the good jur-ors said it was all a mis-take—that she hadn't killed any-body. And every-body kis-sed Mary Har-ris because she was a pret-ty girl. And the peo-ple all huz-za'd. And every-body was very happy, and huz-za'd except the old bach-e-lor, who could'nt huz-za because he was dead. O, what a nice thing it is to be a pret-ty girl and shoot an old bach-e-lor. Lit-tle girls, be affec-tion-ate and shoot old bach-e-lors.

THE STORY OF SUSAN NIPPER.

SUSAN NIPPER was a little girl with black eyes. She liked little John-uy Jones very much, for John-uy used to give her mot-toes and car-o-mels. One day when they were play-ing for-feits, John-ny was told to "kiss the one that he loved best." Now little Susan Nipper thought that John-ny would kiss her, but John-uy went up and kissed Mary Smith in-stead, who had a freck-led face and red-hair. Then Susan Nip-per took a chop-per and chop-ped off John-ny's head. Then her parents instantly said: "How affec-tion-ate our Su san must be."

THE STORY OF MARIA JENKINS.

MARIA JEN-KINS was a love-ly little girl who lived at Dutch Flat. One night when she was at a par-ty with her beau, she went into the corner of the room and wept bitterly. And her friend Sarah Skin-ner asked her why she cried. "Because," said Maria Jen-kins, "William Stubbs, my beau, has danced twice with that hor-rid Lucy Sprig-gins." "Do not cry," said Sarah Skin-ner, who was a very obliging girl. "Re-mem-ber Mary Har-ris!" Then Maria Jen-kins dried her face, and went and got a cannon from the armory, and shot William Stubbs through the head. Then the people all said: "What a lov-ing heart has Maria Jen-kins, and how obliging is Sarah Skinner." ANCIENT.

MISREPRESENTATION AS A CAUSE OF WAR.

IT is doubtless of great importance to the world's tranquility, as well as to the interests of both nations, that England and the United States should maintain not only peaceful but cordially amicable relations. And if we are to believe the oft-reiterated, we might almost say stereotyped declarations, alike from the throne, the parliamentary benches, the hustings, the banqueting room, the platform and the pulpit, there is nothing which our English brethren have more at heart than that peace and good will may be perpetual between what Burke used to call "the two branches of the English race." We heartily respond to that wish, and believe that it is the sincere and general desire of the American people. That beautiful petition of the Anglican liturgy, "Grant peace in our time, O Lord," is never breathed with greater fervor than when mentally directed toward the land whence we derived our birth, and so much beside that constitutes our glorious past and our yet more glorious future.

But it is vain to deny that this most desirable peace is in great danger of being interrupted. Dangers are not averted by shutting our eyes to them. On the contrary, we may escape them by descrying their approach in time, and taking wise precautions against them. And if there be an evil threatening either nation which all good and patriotic men in both should seek by all possible means to avert, it is a collision between two nations which have so much in common, so many advantages to expect from peace, and so many disasters to apprehend from war.

Many of these sources of uneasiness and alarm—these irritamenta belli—are patent and familiar to the people of both countries. They have been grouped with great vividness and force by Sumner in his masterly portrait of England, "Ready to strike," as delineated in his "Address on our Foreign Relations." But there are other occasions of ill-will not less grave and even less excusable. Even admitting that the British Government was forced to recognition and helpless to repress violations of neutrality, the utmost forbearance and generosity cannot find a like extenuation for disparaging and unfriendly intimations, which are purely spontaneous, and which will, therefore, and must be accepted in this country as genuine manifestations of the spirit of the English toward the people of the United States. The literature and science of England, we grieve to say, bristles on every side with indications of the same spirit which has given birth to pirates and blockade runners, which mounted the ramparts of Fort Fisher with Armstrong guns, and caused our brave fellows to find multitudes of rifles bearing the stamp of "Tower, London," locked in the grasp of dead rebels on the fields of Antietam and Gettysburg.

There is no subject so remote from American topics as not to furnish an English writer vantage ground whence to let off a shaft at our Government, our morals, or our social life. A writer in the North British Review some time ago, in an article on "Goethe as a man of science," took occasion to remark that liberty has a widely different significance in different communities. "In England," observes the reviewer, "it means reverence for habeas corpus and a sturdy maintenance of the right to it; in America it means license to insult anybody with impunity." The ridiculous falsehood of the charge does not prevent it from being an insult, and no insult which could be put into words would more deeply aggrieve and irritate the American people than a charge of lawlessness, utterly belied as it is by their history, their whole consciousness, and, we may add, by the verdict of the civilized world, expressed by such living publicists as Laboulaye, Montalembert and Mills, and of the illustrious dead by Edmund Burke, who expressed his especial admiration of that deep reverence for law which characterized the American people.

This charge, the gravest and most offensive which can be brought against a self-governing people, is perhaps that which is oftenest made or insinuated by English writers, plentifully mingled, too, with other ingredients calculated to season it with increased pungency and bitterness. We meet with it not unfrequently in works—so called—of pure science. The British Journal of Mental Science for July, 1863, contains a memoir of Dr. Luther Bell, an eminent American physician, whose acquirements in medical science, especially that branch of it which pertains to diseases of the mind, seem to have secured for him trans-Atlantic fame. Dr. Bell, at the breaking out of our great war for Union and liberty, forsook an honorable and lucrative position at the head of one of our principal institutions, and though in very weak health, devoted himself to the service of his country as a surgeon in the field. The service proved too severe for him, and he yielded up his life on the altar of patriotism and humanity. His generous martyrdom receives the following compliment from his British biographer: "Dr. Luther Bell was moved by the demon of war to go forth and aid President Lincoln's insane and hopeless attempt to force on the Southern Confederacy the mob rule of the North by aid of foreign hirelings and ex-Attorney Generals."

The Journal cites the following passage from one of Dr. Bell's letters while in the field: "Were I at home," says Dr. Bell, "I would go resolutely for the present Executive as the highest duty, and for the support of those means and men that went most fully for a vigorous prosecution of this war." On which the English writer favors us with this comment: "Fancy any sane man writing such wickedness."

The love of country is so grand a sentiment that, even in its wildest perversion, it inspires respect in all elevated minds. The noble Roman poet would have said at such a spectacle of self-sacrifice, Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. The English journalist makes no other comment than "Fancy any sane man writing such wickedness!"

If the British Government refused to recognize the Confederacy, the writers of England have done their best to make up for this by proclaiming on all occasions and in all connections that "the once United States" were forever shattered, dissevered, exploded, and that the independence of the South was as good as an accomplished fact. Even in this year, 1865, the London Quarterly continues to speak of "the collapse of the great experiment of democracy,' declares that "the hopes of an early termination of the war are fading away," that "the North" has shown along with "blind ferocity an equal inability to produce statesmen of power to conduct the struggle with success, or prudence to close it without dishonor," that the South is "unconquerable," and its success being a certainty, the sagacious reviewer affirms that "the limits of the future Confederacy are marked out with tolerable decision by the hand of nature. The natural boundary," he adds, "will be the range of mountains which extends from a point near Memphis on the Mississippi, to Harper's Ferry on the Potomac." This is as good as the London Times' remark that Burnside's troops for the North Carolina expedition would be landed from the transports at Wheeling.

The "boundary of the future Confederacy" being thus ascertained by British sagacity, British science has already begun to adapt its nomenclature to this shadowy partition of the American continent. A recent article in the Edinburg Review "on Coniferous Trees" informs the world that "the deciduous cypress is a native of the Confederate States of North America." He is obliged just after to admit that some of its finest specimens are to be found in Mexico, so that to have called it a "native of the southern part of North America" would have been much more accurate. But an opportunity of recognizing the "Confederate States" was not to be omitted, even at the expense of geographical accuracy. We have no objection that the lugubrious cypress ("tristis cupressus") should be regarded not only as a native but an emblem of a "Confederacy" which had so short and sorrowful a life, and which has inflicted on so many American families, especially in the South, a "sorrow which refuses to be comforted." Let British sympathizers by all means plant the cypress, especially the "deciduous" variety of it, at the gravestone of the departed "Confederacy;" but when future naturalists inquire for the native region of "the deciduous cypress," it would be a very vague and unsatisfactory answer to say "the Confederate States of North America." A Dutch witness, called on to define the western boundary of a farm on the Hudson, deposed that "it was where Hans Bergen had his snow-path last winter." The "limits of the Southern Confederacy" have proved as evanescent as the traces of "Hans Bergen's snow-path." The shadow of a cloud which sweeps along the mountain side does not vanish more suddenly and utterly than "the limits" of this "Confederacy" to which, less than three months before its downfall, a British reviewer assigns "a boundary" of mountain chains, rivers and coast lines.

Insulting allusions to the American people have become so common in what is considered the higher class of British periodicals, that the writers, probably, do not much consider the consequences nor reflect that such a tone would not for a moment be endured between equal individuals, and cannot long be between equal nations. Blackwood, not long ago, speaking of the villainies of certain Italian contractors, thus illustrates: "With an amount of malversation and corruption that Yankees alone can rival."

Such ebullitions of spite and rancor may be passed by with contempt by the American people, but they cannot be without influence. And this must be such as all good and humane men cannot but deplore. In the event of a casus belli—an event cut too probable in the complicated relations and still unsettled questions between the two countries—they must tend, as far as their influence goes, to blow up the embers of latent popular jealousies into the open flame of mutually disastrous war.—N. Y. Evening Post.

SOUTHERN NEED OF ARMY.—It seems to be the general judgment now among the well informed that the force required to keep the peace in the South will be far less than our amiable well wishers of the English Tory press would believe; less, indeed, than the most sanguine of us expected. The testimony of officers who have come in contact with the Southern soldiers since the disbandment of their armies shows that they have come to the very sensible conclusion that they are badly whipped, and that nothing is left for them but to accept the result and become, in spirit, as well as in fact, citizens of the United States once more. Over their cups they will give expression to such sentiments as these, and join with seeming heartiness in the toast to "one country." They have done their best, they say; they have failed, and it is idle to fight against destiny. It is not with the men who have fought us like men that we are to have trouble in the future. There is scarcely a doubt that by the adoption of a just and conciliatory policy towards them, we can bring them speedily back to a true allegiance. Our difficulty will be with those miserable fellows who have refused to fulfil the obligation of citizenship toward either section; the men who, both South and North, have sympathized with secession, so far as railing at the government and shirking their obligations to it were concerned, and who, while renouncing their allegiance to the United States "to go with their section," have taken good care to go with it only so far as they could without interfering, in any way, with their selfish personal interest—these, and the class of men who have been the willing instruments of the "Confederacy," in all murdering and thieving expeditions, are the elements of opposition with which we shall have to contend. And it is from these classes that examples should be selected for punishment. Charity toward them will, indeed, be cruelty to the State. But those who have had the manliness to sacrifice and to suffer for their declared convictions, can, as a rule, be safely treated with magnanimity when the hard logic of events has once convinced them of their error. In them we may look for some of the best elements of citizenship, which require only to be rightly developed and directed.—Correspondent of the Army and Navy Journal.

THE Pioneer Stage Company has purchased the line of the California Stage Company extending from Clipper Gap to Virginia City. We understand that the former company transfer their mail and express to the latter route on or about the 1st of September next.—Sacramento Union.

THE OLD HOUSE AND THE NEW ONE.

ALMOST all of us know what it is to "change house"—to go off from our old haunts, the corners we have loved so well, the time worn-ways of home, and install ourselves in some new domicile, where everything is new, strange and unsettled. There are few things in life so full of discomfort. The more a man sees of the world, the more is he disposed to believe that a certain routine—a sort of quiet monotony in the general tenor of life—is one of the choicest aids to happiness. In fact, until this same "dull monotony," as some call it, be established, the real enjoyment of variety can never be experienced. There can be no furlough where there is no discipline. The business of life, besides, requires that even the idlest and most indolent of us, should have a certain method. There must be meal-times, and these, let me observe, are in a great measure the determining influences which render us active, energetic and useful, or dispose us to sloth, neglect and good-for-nothingness. Tell me when a man eats, and I will tell you when he works. We are, in a word, far more slaves to ourselves than we acknowledge; but I am decidedly inclined to believe that, on the whole, the servitude works well. Now the house we live in for a number of years cannot fail to exert great influence over us. The same places impress the same trains of thought, till at last we give ourselves up to a ritual, in which the drawing-room, the dining-room and the study are the masters, and certain inanimate objects, on which we scarcely bestow a thought, become our impulses and our directors.

With a change of house all this is revolutionized. You have to plot out your home—that is your life—anew. You have to discuss aspects and views, the points of the compass, and the prevailing winds — to balance with yourself the advantages of the rising against the setting sun—to think where you can sleep most profoundly, and dine most snugly; and above all, if a man of my temperament, where you can install yourself in a so-called study, a spot religiously believed to be sacred to meditation and labor, but in sober reality a Sleepy Hollow of refuge, dedicated to that noble pastime that is said to pave a disreputable region—a pastime which, in all its vague unreality, I would not exchange for many a practiced tangible pleasure. With a change of house all these devolve upon you. You cannot begin the daily work of life till they be determined, nor can you determine them without a constant reference to the past. Your drawing-room may be larger and loftier, your study may offer more space or accommodation; but depend up it there will always be something in which the by-gone will contrast favorably with the present. That this is a condition of human thought, I am inclined to believe; at least all my friends who have been married a second time have confidently imparted to me something that would go far to confirm it.

How long is it, too, before you can reconcile yourself to the new ways about you! There is a perpetual distraction in the sight of new objects, very jarring and uncomfortable; things which had no pretention to press themselves upon your thoughts stand obtrusively forward and ask to be considered; and, last of all, nobody can find anything. It is either locked up in the green packing-case or the brown box, or it has been left behind, or perhaps stolen. Scores of useless old trumperies are sure to be transported—things that could not possibly pay for the carriage, but which have an immense value in your servants' eyes, if only that they guarantee the immaculate integrity that remembered them. These, like poor relations, will thrust themselves reproachfully in your way at every moment, and it will be weeks before the last of them shall be consigned to its appropriate oubliette.

CHANCE FOR THE GIRLS.—At last, says the Home Journal, there is a chance for unmarriageable ladies under thirty-two. A kind of joint-stock company or lottery has been started in Scotland, and will doubtless soon find imitators in other places. The plan is this—a young man at Abernethy propounds it through the advertising columns of the Banffshire Journal: "All widows and maidens who have not attained the age of thirty-two are invited to buy of him a ticket at the price of ten shillings. After three hundred tickets are sold at this figure the drawing will take place. There will be only one prize, and this "prize" will be the right of the fortunate lady who wins it to claim the young gentleman for her husband, and partake with him of the comforts to be derived from the one hundred and fifty pounds produced by the lottery." We should think "the young gentleman" would not spend a very happy life with a woman who had been silly enough to put herself up to be raffled for.

THE will of the late James Nisbet, says the Bulletin, is written plainly and firmly in pencil, on a sheet of note paper, covering about one page and an eighth. It directs the mode of settling his estate, and bequeaths his property to his brother and sister. Accompanying his will, on the same sheet of paper, are two brief notes, also written in pencil, in which he states that he was writing "in the face of death." These notes contain words of affectionate adieu to his relatives and most intimate personal friends.

A RIDDLE.

A BIRD sat singing in my heart,
As if singing in a cage:
And I loved the bird so well
That I held her quite apart,
So no creature might engage
Aught of all the songs that fell
With her bosom's flowing song;
But alas! it was not long,
(After all my toil and art,)
The bird sat singing in my heart.

For the bird's song was so sweet,
Though I put the cage away
Out of harm's reach, as I thought,
Every man I chanced to meet
Knew, before a word I'd say,
That a wonder I had caught
And concealed; each one could trace
Half the secret in my face:
So I told the tale complete,
For the bird's song was so sweet.

Never sang the bird again:
As they turned their foolish eyes
On my cage door, quick my hand
Oped it. Lo! the bird, not slow,
But with suddenest surprise,
Off she flew across the land.
Have you found it, idle friend,
That you pause to guess my end?
Content is the bird I seek in vain—
Perchance she never sings again.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

STYLISH EQUIPAGES IN PARIS.

A PARIS correspondent writes: "The Champs Elysees has presented the most aristocratic appearance during the past week. Omnibuses have long been prevented from thrusting their lumbering forms 'betwixt the wind' and the 'gentility,' but cabs have not been expelled 'par ordre de M. le Prefet.' Their voluntary disappearance, however, has given us leisure to study the immense progress there has been made of late years towards perfection in the style in which the great world of Paris turn out their equipages.

"Prince Paul Demidoff drives a phæton and a pair of magnificent Russian steppers, jet black, and of the peculiar race so celebrated in Russia for carrying off all the prizes at the trotting matches, which are as common in that country as in America. The Prince's barouche with four bays is very perfect, the harness not showing too much silver, the liveries dark green and orange, with the Russian cockade, which is black, orange, and white. The Prince's dark green drag, picked out with orange, which he drives himself, excites even English admiration. I dare not tell you what he paid for his team, which is matchless. His mines in the Ural Mountains are, as you are aware, almost as productive as Monte Christo's island. At one of the fancy balls of last season the costume his highness had chosen was remarked on—a plain buff coat, being a singular contrast to the glittering dresses of the rest of the company. 'Have you seen the Prince's cap?' 'His cap?' was the reply, 'it was black velvet.' 'And the button?' 'Ah! what is it?' 'The Sanci diamond, worth half a million.'

"The Duke de Montmorency's sister, Princess de Sagan, with her dark blue barouche, picked out with red, attracts attention, from the fact that she drives one gray and one chestnut, perfectly matched, however, and good steppers. The liveries of her husband's ancient house have been for centuries light blue and red, and powder, which is not sine qua non here, as it is in London.

"The Comtesse Mercy Argenteon's turn-out is English. The Comte drives in his phæton a pair of gray ponies from Tarbes, capital goers, but I venture to suggest to M. le Comte the advantage of learning how to handle the ribbons before endangering our valuable lives by his deviations from the straight line. The Comtesse rides better than any other woman in Paris, and dresses well beside. M. de Lastrade's horses are Norman, and would make capital hunters. The Duke de la Rochefoucauld drives his phæton and pair of dark bays at a slapping pace, while the great M. de Rothschild may be daily seen in his unpretending waggonet quietly tooling along his black ponies unremarked by any one who does not happen to know him by sight. The late Lord Pembroke's coachman drives the magnificent equipage of Madame Musard, whose husband's concerts we have all enjoyed. Vicomte Aguado sold her his splendid team of light bays for one thousand seven hundred pounds, and last Sunday her Victoria, the horses a la Daumont, the postilions wearing jackets of vert d'Isly satin, attracted great attention. A Russian droschky was the novelty yesterday—the coachman a true Mujik; the horses trotting at a wonderful pace."

COMMA WANTED.—An English clergyman was lately depicting before a deeply interested audience the alarming increase of intemperance, when he astonished his hearers by exclaiming: "A young woman in my neighborhood died very suddenly last Sabbath, while I was preaching the Gospel in a state of intoxication!"

THE PETTICOAT QUESTION.—Some time ago when petticoats were intended to be concealed, their fabric make up and ornamentation were matters of little interest, comfort and convenience being alone regarded. Now it is different. Petticoats are meant to be seen and almost as much pains are expended on them in elegance and show as on the outer garments. The dress-skirt is very generally looped up to display the petticoat, thus revealing often most remarkable works of toilet art.

Looping up contrivances are numerous and varied. There are patent elevators, hooks and eyes, strings and pins. A new kind of pin, recently introduced, will doubtless prove very popular. They are of four different sizes and fasten in the manner of a brooch.

For travelling costume the dress, petticoat, and mantle are of the same material and trimmed alike. Very pretty ones are made of a light dust color glace alpaca, trimmed with a brown cord resembling leather, arranged above the hem in scallops, and turned in a loop at the point of each scallop. This trimming should edge the sack sleeves and pockets. Buff goat's hair trimmed with brown ribbons, pearl-colored mohair bordered with a band of a darker shade edged with black braid, steel-colored alpaca trimmed elaborately with green ribbon—all these are among the pretty suits we have seen.

White petticoats are of course much worn in Summer, and are often more elaborately trimmed than the dress-skirt Fluted ruffles are exceedingly popular. Sometimes two, four inches wide, or three of two inches, are employed as trimming, or else the skirt is simply edged with a narrow fluted ruffle headed by rows of tucks, insertion lined with a color, or a braiding design. Variety, however, is required, and some of the more fanciful skirts are ornamented with bands of white muslin, chain-stitched with colored silk or cotton in many ingenious designs. Bands of blue, pink, or buff cambric stitched on in a pattern, make a very effective trimming. This style of trimming has very much the effect of ribbon, with the advantage that it will wash well and do up with little trouble. More elaborate skirts have the ruffles edged with white or black lace; this, however, is too expensive a luxury for many to indulge in, and is not as effective a trimming as many others less expensive.

PERSONAL.—First Lieutenant Thompson Campbell, Jr., of the regular army, an old resident of San Francisco for his age, a veteran of the early campaigns against the rebellion, and an efficient officer in the various departments of military service in which he has been employed in this vicinity, takes his departure for the States in the steamer this morning, in accordance with orders from Washington to report at the headquarters of his regiment, Portland, Maine. We were inclined to question the wisdom of the War Department, at first, in sending Tom so far away during the present unsettled state of affairs on the Pacific coast, but our uneasiness was set at rest by his personal assurance that no less than four regiments of picked men have been ordered out here to take his place! This is probably the only good thing this veteran has said for some time, and the shock to his nervous system occasioned by its sudden conception prostrated him upon a bed of sickness for the space of two months, and utterly ruined his constitution. He got off easily, though—in the good old days of Annanias and Sapphira sudden death was the penalty for this particular species of levity. "So-long," Tom.

HOW TO MAKE TEA.—A French chemist asserts that if tea be ground like coffee before hot water is put upon it, it will yield double the amount of exhillarating qualities. Another writer says, "If a piece of lump sugar the size of a walnut is put into the tea-pot, you will make the tea infuse in one-half the time."

A COMIC singer named Sam Collins died, lately, at a music-hall in London. It was his benefit night, and many had taken their seats; but such was the critical state of the proprietor, that it was deemed prudent to inquire whether the entertainment should be proceeded with. The reply given by the unfortunate man was, "Go on;" but, ten minutes afterward, his death was announced, when the place was, of course, cleared, and the doors closed.

ACCORDING to La France, the Queen of Madagascar, on the 15th of April, held a religious ceremony to inaugurate her Majesty's assumption of the dress called crinoline, which is henceforth to be a form of raiment reserved for members of the royal family. The only exception made was in favor of her prime minister's wife, Madame Rainilairyony.

WITHIN a stone's throw of Stewart's new marble house on Fifth Avenue is a dwelling really believed to be haunted It is an imposing and elegant building. It has been occupied and abandoned by three families within a few months. It is now in the market.—Home Journal.

A HORSE-STEALER on his way to the Iowa State Prison while on a steamboat, threw his manacled hands over the neck of the man who was guarding him, and making a desperate leap forward, threw himself and the man into the river. Both were drowned.

AN UNPATENTED GHOST.

SO plentiful, of late, has been the supply of spectral apparitions, that it is with some difficulty a new phantom, though furnished with the strongest testimonials, can obtain a patient hearing. It will therefore, perhaps, be the discreeter course to fall in with the commercial tone which has been given to the subject, and be content with stating, in reference to the ghost about to appear, that it is wholly unprotected by any patent regulations whatever, and perfectly at the service of anybody who can, by the exercise of legitimate spells, render it correspondent to command.

In the year eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, a gentleman, whose name, we shall pretend, is Gauntrell, though in fact it is nothing of the sort, was induced, by the prospect of excellent perch fishing, to rent a comfortable cottage residence, in a somewhat secluded neighborhood, a few miles from Abergavenny.

What particular fun there can be in snaring that very abrupt, aggressive, and—when captured—all but worthless, fish, we cannot divine. Excepting the charm of voracity, it seems to display no characteristic that should endear it to the angler's soul, or be likely to beguile a sensible, middle-aged gentleman, like Mr. Gauntrell, to settle two hundred miles from his natural haunts and home. Habit, however, is second nature, a fact one is apt to forget, while opening the eyes of wonder at a hero who smokes his cheroot under a heavy cannonade, or a distinguished character (of another kind) who expressly stipulates for pig and prune sauce (and "plenty" of the latter) as his final repast on earth. Mr. Gauntrell had passed his earlier years on the banks of a famous perch river, and the enmity there first engendered between himself and the warlike fish family, had probably assumed something of the aspect of the vendetta, or death-feud, extending even to other streams and districts.

To speak with precision, "Grisewood Cottage" was something more than it pretended to be, possessing two good stories, the upper nestling in an enormous deep thatched roof, half overgrown with creepers and lichen, and an excellent kitchen, subterrene on the one side, but, owing to the peculiar formation of the ground on which the cottage stood, superterrene on the other, with a window looking to the garden. Excepting a door opening into the scullery, there was but one other, that through which a flight of steps led up to the hall passage. Let this be remembered.

The rent demanded for Grisewood Cottage was exceedingly moderate—so low, indeed, as to have induced the incoming tenant to make the unwonted inquiry, whether something prejudicial to health or comfort might not have suggested the terms proposed.

The agent smiled.

Why did the agent smile? Because he was a man of some penetration, and saw in his questioner a person who would take the initiative in smiling, if he—the agent—did not, when told what the latter was bound to disclose, namely, that Grisewood cottage, like dozens, scores, of other desirable dwellings in the superstitious west, had been suspected of a certain amount of—hauntedness. Mr. Gauntrell did smile.

"Not sufficient, I conclude, to interfere with our convenience?" he inquired.

"Quite the reverse," was the prompt reply.

"The reverse?"

"Literally so. It has been found of absolute service."

"You excite my curiosity. Pray be explicit."

The agent paused.

"Sir," he said," "I am not only bound, but perfectly willing, to tell you what is the matter with this house, and I could do so in two words. So far, I am in your hands. But, if I mistake not, you have made up your mind, ghost or no ghost, to take the cottage, and I am tempted to ask your permission to withold the information you have a right to require, in order that you may, unprejudiced by any previous warning, observe the disturbing influence, and probably detect its mysterious origin, for yourself. In doing so, you would not only confer on the landlord a service for which, I am sure, he would willingly place the house at your disposal for a term, rent free, but would also disabuse the rustic mind in your vicinity of superstitious fancies which are but too apt to influence it."

The shrewd agent had not misjudged Mr. Gauntrell's disposition. Nothing, perhaps, except, it may be, the unexpected appearance of a vast shoal of perch, on the feed, could have pleased him more than such an opportunity. The bargain was at once struck, and the family, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Gauntrell, two daughters, a son (a young Cantab, reading, in his vacation, for honors,) and four servants, entered into residence.

For about three weeks all went tranquilly. The locality was charmingly rural, the perch fed like famished aldermen, and the ghost, to say the truth, had been entirely forgotten—when, one night, Mr. Gauntrell, who had remained up later than usual, writing letters in his study, received an unexpected visit from his footman-butler. Thomas was a cool, intelligent London servant, and had been for several years in his present situation.

"There's something very queer below, sir," said the man, in a low, serious tone.

"'Queer?'" said Mr. Gauntrell, the agent's report suddenly flashing on his mind. "What do you make of it, Thomas?"

"Can't make nothing of it, sir, or I shouldn't have troubled you, so late as it is," said Thomas. "Perhaps you wouldn't mind stepping down, sir?"

"Not at all. Who's below?"

"Emma (the lady's maid) and Jane are sitting on the stairs, sir. Cook said her nerves wouldn't stand it no longer, and she went to bed."

"Why had you all sat up so late?"

"It kept a-coming and a-going, sir," said Thomas, "and we was waiting till it was full on, thinking that was the time for you to see it."

"'It,' man! Is it a ghost?" asked Mr. Gauntrell, as they left the room.

Thomas only shook his head doubtfully, and followed his master down stairs.

"No light?", said Mr. Gauntrell, feeling his way.

"We thought you'd see better without one, sir," was Thomas's reply.

Emma and Jane were sitting, arm in arm, nearly at the top of the little flight of stairs, within sight, and very easy reach, of the study door. All below seemed as dark as night could make it.

"I think it must be gone for good and all," said Thomas, stretching down cautiously.

Mr. Gauntrell was becoming impatient.

"Come, come," he said "What is all this about? What have you seen? What do you fear?"

Thus urged, Thomas delivered the following explanation:

It would seem that one night, about a week after the arrival of the family, as Emma was sitting alone at work in the kitchen, the door standing ajar, she became suddenly sensible of an augmentation of light in the room. Aware that no one entered, she put her hand to her cap, under the impression that it had taken fire. The cap, however, was all right. She looked eagerly round. Neither fire nor smoke was visible, nor did any smell of burning accompany the phenomenon. Nevertheless, the light disseminated by her solitary candle had increased twenty-fold!

Seized with an unaccountable panic, the girl, catching up her candlestick, darted from the room. The darkness of the passage caused her to observe that the candle had been extinguished in her rapid movement. She glanced back. The kitchen was filled with a whitish lustre as bright as day!

The cook, who had not yet retired to bed, listened with considerable alarm to Emma's statement of what was occurring in her own domain, but positively declined to descend, unaccompanied by Thomas. It became necessary, therefore, to apprise that gentleman of the circumstance; and thus was occasioned a delay of some three or four minutes, at the end of which time Thomas, creeping gently down, found all as dark, and to all appearance as secure as usual.

It happened that Mrs. Gauntrell was at this time in a somewhat nervous and delicate state of health. The servants therefore agreed among themselves that nothing should be said to her on the subject of the phenomenon; at all events, until it should again occur.

It did again occur within a few days, and at a moment when the cook, Jane, and Thomas were together in the kitchen. On this occasion, the increase of light was so gradual, that it for some time escaped their observation, until Thomas, whose eyes happened to be directed towards a small printed paper affixed to the wall, noticed that the words gradually became legible.

"It's coming," said Thomas. "Don't be afeard, Mrs. Mortimer; but when I say 'Now,' blow out your candle. So will I. Now."

Out went both lights. It made no difference in the steadily augmenting splendor. The room became as radiant as though six lustres were burning within it.

For a half minute or so, the awe-stricken servants sat dumb and motionless in their chairs, when the light began to diminish, and much more quickly than it had come, disappeared altogether.

Another consultation was now held. Mrs. Mortimer, whose courage was scarcely equal to that of the high race whose name she bore, insisted that mistress should be told, without delay. The counsels of the cooler Thomas, however, prevailed, so far as to give "the thing," as he affected to call it, a still further trial, and this was done.

Twice more had the incident occurred, when Mrs. Mortimer, "wore out," as she expressed it, finally struck her colors, and, on the fifth appearance, Mr. Gauntrell was warned, as described.

It further appeared that, this last time, the light, instead of exhibiting a steady increase, had somewhat vacillated, waxing and waning, withdrawing almost entirely, then returning with greater power, yet never attaining its maximum brilliancy, until, before Mr. Gauntrell descended, it vanished altogether. Such was the history.

The most minute examination of the room, extended to the scullery adjoining, revealed nothing to Mr. Gauntrell that could, in any wise, point to a solution of the singular phenomenon. The window, secured with one huge strong shutter, offered no perceptible crevice through which even a thread of light could penetrate, still less the mighty flood that had been directed into the apartment. The consternation of the female servants was too genuine to be mistaken: the integrity of Thomas beyond suspicion.

All that could be done was to be in readiness for the next recurrence of the event; and, for this purpose, Mr. Gauntrell contrived an apparatus by means of which he might be warned, at any instant, from the kitchen, of the approach of the phenomenon; this was, next day, continued to other apartments above, for Mr. Gauntrell, aware of the firmness and calm good sense which characterized the members of his family, made no scruple of relating to them, at breakfast, all that had occurred.

By reason of the early habits of Grisewood Cottage, the expected signal, when it was at length given, found the master of the house alone in his study. Hastily telegraphing to his son, who was reading, still dressed, in his own apartment, and joined him in an instant, Mr. Gauntrell descended the haunted precinct.

Thomas was there, alone. One candle was burning on the table; but, already, its light was overborne by the mysterious glow, and, when Mr. Gauntrell extinguished it, the sole result was to give to the growing lustre a purer and more silvery tone. Clear and lucid as a beautiful dawn, the strange splendor grew into the room, lighting up every speck and crevice with a ray as searching, though not so warm in color, as that of noon.

Young Gauntrell rushed to the shutter, and drew it down. All without was pitchy darkness, nor (strange to say) was any portion of the lustre that prevailed within, projected into the obscurity. In vain did the two cool investigators search in every direction for a possible nucleus of this strange fount of light. It was dispersed, with one uniform power, throughout the room. After the lapse of a minute, or a minute and a half, the radiance began to diminish, first slowly, then rapidly, vanishing, at last, with a start, so to speak, as if some one, bearing a lamp, had suddenly closed the slide.

It would be needless to dwell upon the efforts made by Mr. Gauntrell, aided by his family, to arrive at some solution of this enigma, which, puzzling as it was, they one and all believed to lie within the province of discovery. Philosophical conjecture, no more than material investigation, was able to suggest the slightest clue. Appeal to the agent proved that the phenomenon described was identical, in character, with those which had cost Grisewood Cottage its good name. Still, Mr. Gauntrell did not abandon the hope of dispelling the singular mystery.

The incident began now to recur so frequently that the domestics—Mrs. Mortimer excepted—grown familiar with it, discarded their terror, and even began to regard it as a curious performance, provided for their amusement. Mrs. Mortimer's nerves, however, were not proof against the strain. The kitchen was hers; she was responsible for all that happened there; and to have this "queer fire" burning when it wasn't wanted, and making her hair stand up, on account of the kitchen flue, was more than cook could bear. As, however, Mrs. Mortimer was an excellent servant, and attached to the family, an arrangement was effected by which leave of absence would be granted to her for the remaining months of Mr. Gauntrell's tenancy, and her place temporarily supplied. Thereupon, Mrs. Mortimer departed.

Now became manifest the disadvantages of an evil reputation. The party who had been relied upon to discharge the offices of cook, positively declined to remain in the house later than nine of the clock, evening. This being attended with inconvenience, she was dismissed in a day or two, and another substitute was sought. The inquiry seemed fruitless. Far or near, no one could be found willing to undertake the culinary department, with residence, at Grisewood Cottage.

During this state of things, a curious incident occurred. Young Richard Gauntrell, who had somewhat over-fatigued his student brain, one day resolved upon a walk as far as Abergavenny, and arrived there, in due course, about noon. In that town there stands a small quaint quiet coffee-house, of the temperance persuasion, known as the "Greeting Hands," and in the clean fresh parlor of that house there sat, on the day in question, a little old lady, eating bread and cheese. She was a bright and brisk old lady, with clear busy eyes, and a cheek which, though no longer young, looked as if it would be pleasant and comfortable to kiss. That she was also a careful and wide-awake old lady was proved by her—rather sharply, for her—reproving another guest who, on entering, had nearly tripped over a bundle she had placed on the floor.

"That's all the property I have in the world, young man," said the old dame, "and if you'd broke your nose over it, it wouldn't have done any good to you or me."

The guest, admitting that there was an absence of any perceptible advantage to either in such a catastrophe, begged respectfully to ask why it was necessary to place her property so elose to the threshold.

"Why, to be ready for a start, young man," was the reply. "I don't know what momeut I may he come for, you see"

"I thiuk whoever's comiug treats you very bad," said the landlady. 'Here you've been, with your hnndle packed, and your bonnet on, two whole days."

"I'm noways impatient," said the old lady.

"Do you mind my asking where you're going?" asked the laudlady.

"Not I, my dear. 'Tis 'corden as I dreams."

"According as you dreams!" echoed the landlady.

"To he sure," retorted the old lady, cheerily. "We comes of a dreaming family, and we always goes by it. I say, my dear, cau I get a horse and cart, if I want a lift, Ebbw Vale way?"

"Yes, sure. When shall you go?"

"Wheu my young man eomes. Bnt he'll be a walking, and p'r'aps he won't like to carry my luggage."

"He must be a very devoted young man if he do," said the landlady, laughing. What's he like?"

"He's a handsome young man, also pale, which I'm afraid he takes too mueh out of hisself, in pint of stndy," said the old lady. "He's not far off now."

"Am I the young man?" inquired the male guest, a young farmer of the neighborhood.

"Hush!" exclaimed the old lady. "I do believe that's him. Yes; he's a coming in. I see him turu."

The uext moment the door opened, and Richard Gauntrell entered.

The old dame started up.

"Here I am, young man. I'll go."

"Go!" exclaimed Gauntrell, who, attracted by the appearance of the clean little hostel, had turned in for some refreshment. "What does this good lady mean?" he iuqnired.

"You're wanting a cook?"

"Very much," replied the young man, laughing.

"Here I am, sir," said the old lady, tying her bonnet-strings.

"But you dou't know about the place."

"Nor dou't care," was the answer.

"Character?" suggested Gauutrell.

"Here's a hatful," said the old lady, producing several letters. Two of these the hostess presently pronounced to be from ladies of station, residents in the county.

Ganntrell hesitated. Here was a prize indeed. He felt, however, that the peculiar circumstances of the case should not be concealed, aud the guest withdrawing, and the hostess being summoned away, an opportuuity was afforded him of giviug the cheerful old lady to understand that there was, in fact, a ghost in the case.

"I don't care for no ghostes," was her reply. "I rather likes 'em. When all alone, they gives quite a relish to one's tea."

Under such circumstances, there could be no farther scruple on either part. A light carriage was obtained, and the old lady and her long-expected "young man" did really depart in company.

At Grisewood Cottage, it is needless to say, the pair were received with open arms. Mr. Gauntrell had executed a long and successful foray among the perch; but his exploits were completely lost in the splendid fish captured by his son. As for the brisk old lady herself—Mrs. Applebee, as she was called—alter a brief interview with her mistress she threw herself at once into the heart of office, winning easily the affection and confidence of her fellow domestics, and demeaning herself altogether as though she had lived in the family twenty years. She had an extraordinary flow of animal spirits, which never seemed to flag, and a pleasant hearty voice, which, constantly as it was heard, never tired the ear.

Now Richard Gauntrell, in touching upon the ghost, had purposely avoided describing the precise nature of the disturbing mystery, curious to see in what manner it would act upon the apparently fearless intelligence about to be confronted with it. But it had escaped his memory to warn the servants to do likewise, and hence, when, sitting together after supper, Mrs. Applebee suddenly bethought her of the ghost, and requested particulars, Mr. Thomas at once gave them.

As he proceeded, to the extreme amazement of all, the hitherto fearless old lady turned deadly pale, and lay back, as if gasping for breath, in her chair.

"How—how often—does he come?" she presently ejaculated.

Thomas did not notice the expression "he," and only answered that the visitation might occur any night—perhaps, then.

"Then, my dears," said Mrs. Applebee, presently regaining her looks and smiles, "you do a poor old lady this kindness. Moment you see him—the light, that is—coming, all of you bolt up-stairs like frightened rabbits, and leave me all alone." Emma drew a long breath.

"Well, you are a bold one, Mrs. Applebee."

"'Mr. Greatheart led the way,'" quoted the old lady, with her confident smile. "I'm afraid of nothing He sees fit to suffer in the world."

It was remembered that, while she was yet speaking, the marvellous light began to steal into the room, slowly, this time, as the revealiug of an actual dawn.

All looked at Mrs. Applebee—Thomas raising his hand, as if to apprise her of what her less experienced eyes might not have yet detected. The old lady nodded. She betrayed no trace of fear, but, as the light increased, her countenance seemed to put on a strange solemnity.

Presently she signed to the door, when the servants, remembering her request, all three quitted the room. Turning at the top of the stairs, Thomas, who went last, observed that the apartment was filled with a radiance brighter than auy they had yet beheld.

For the next half hour, the servants waited quietly in their respective rooms. At length Thomas, becoming a little uneasy, was on the point of going down, when Mrs. Applebee was heard to come softly up-stairs, and retire to bed.

The next morning found her active and cheerful as ever, but uncommunicative as to the ghost. Having got through the greater part of her morning's work, she asked permission to pay a visit to the little village—a mere cluster of the humblest cottages—close at hand, and, tying on her neat bonnet, set forth.

Near the first cottage, she encountered an old woodman, at work with his hatchet on the trunk of a felled tree. Upon this, looking, iu her scarlet cloak aud straw bonnet, like a bright old moth, Mrs. Applebee alighted, and the following couversation ensued. After a brief strangers' greeting:

"Folks very bad off in these parts, master?" inquired the old lady.

"Us, in Duffryn, couldn't hardly buy the Queeu a new crowu, if the old 'un was wore ont," replied the woodman, darkly.

"Poor, are they?"

"Cruel poor."

"But you helps each other?"

"O yes. we helps each other," replied the old man, dealing a savage cut at the tree. He seemed weak, aud in ill health, and the euergy of the action exhausted him, for he sunk the hatchet wearily, and sat down upon the tree.

"Is—is anything the matter?" asked the old lady.

"Hungry, and death," said the man; "nothin' more. Never you mind, missis."

Mrs. Applebee started up in a moment:

"But I must mind," she exclaimed. "Who's hungry? Who's dying? Tell me, tell me, tell me!"

Before her earnestuess, the man's sullen mood gave way.

"I'll tell you, missis," he said, "but don't put yourself out for us. You can't do nothing."

Thereupon, he related to her, in plain rustic terms, a sad—but not strange—history. His daughter, and only child—the beauty, as he called her, of the country round—quitted her honest home—several years before—under the protection of a young soldier, whose attention she had attracted at a neighboring fair. At the end of two years, the girl came wandering back, wretched, ragged, weary, carrying a sickly child. Her seducer had heen ordered on a dangerous foreign service, and, giviug her what he could spare, bade her farewell. Her mother had died in the interval of her absence, and her father, falling into indifferent health, was reduced to the last stage of poverty. The desolate home, however, could still offer the shelter of a roof, and to this the wanderer was made welcome.

It would appear that, either owing to a certain haughtiness in the girl's former bearing, or from the villagers having been deeply impressed by the grief of the heart-broken mother, the rude sympathy usually displayed by persons of their class in mutual misfortune, was withheld. The wretched parish allowance was insufficient for support—outside the Union walls—and, what is an uncommon circumstance in our day, no person of superior condition, in that vicinity, took any interest in the troubles of the poor. Unaided—or, at all events, unassisted in any effectual manner—the misery of this unfortunate family had reached its height, the father being able only to obtain a few hours' work now and then, as on that day, and that for the most trifling remuneration. In truth, they were all but starving.

Mrs. Applebee had listened to the old woodman's narrative with the most fixed attention. When he had finished, she reminded him that he had not mentioned the seducer's name.

"We never knowed it," said the man. "She wouldn't tell. Perhaps it was as well for all," he added, gloomily.

"But his regiment, was it the —th Highlanders?"

"Why, how do you know that?" asked the man, roused from his apathy.

"Black hair, dark blue eyes, thick eyebrows that touched?"

"Well, you arn't a fairy, are you?"

"No," said Mrs. Applebee, "I'm his mother."

"His mother!"

"Yes. Now you take me to Alice, and look sharp about it," said the brisk old dame, "for I'm cooking here, and 've got to be back in a jiffey."

The man looked at her, and led the way. On a wretched pallet, in the miserable hovel to which the family had deseended, lay the once-envied beauty of the hamlet, a querulous, despouding invalid, nursing a yet more weakly child.

How the very presence of the comfortable old lady seemed to bring relief aud blessing, and how the good creature brought the deserted ones to believe that they saw in her the instrument of a merciful Providence, to help and comfort them in their great extremity, we have not space to tell. The interview, though earnest, was necessarily short. For the time, Mrs. Applebee had to hurry away. Alice detained her for a moment, both with hand and eyes, as she asked:

"But how, dear, good woman, did you trace me out?"

"Bless you, my dear, I was warned!" said the old lady, and trotted away.

That evening, in the study, Mrs. Applebee accorded to the family certain explanations, subsequently embodied by Mr. Gauntrell in the following singular statement, to which we beg the reader's attention.

In the spring of 1855, being the second year of the campaign of Sebastopol, Mrs. Applebee received a letter signed by her son, then lying, severely wounded, in hospital at Balaclava, in which, after declaring his belief that he should not recover, he related to her the whole affair of Alice. Her name and place of abode were, however, left blank by his amanuensis—the young man no doubt intending to supply these important particulars with his own hand. This, either from forgetfulness, increasing weakness, or from some cause never ascertained, had not been done, and Mrs. Applebee was thus left without any clue to the mother and child whom, in the early part of the letter, she was affectionately adjured to seek out and relieve.

It was known that young Applebee had been despatched, among a ship-load of sick and wounded, to Scutari; but here all trace of him was lost. The vessel, half-disabled on her passage, had to put back to refit, and, in this interval, he might have died, as did many others, or it is possible he might have ultimately breathed his last in the hospital-ward at Scutari, at a period when deaths were numerous, and the identity of the fever-stricken or unconscious patients often lost and confounded.

One evening, towards the close of that anxious year, Mrs. Applebee was sitting in the housekeeper's room of a large country mansion, near Carleton, of which she had taken charge in the absence of the proprietor. She had had a bustling day, and, overcome with fatigue, dozed, and had a dream. She thought that, while still sitting in her accustomed chair, the room began to fill with a whitish light, which presently grew into amazing lustre, and that, at its height, an impression was conveyed to her, without spoken language, that the appearance concerned her son, and the message he had sent her.

"But what can I do, my dear?" the slumbering old lady had demanded, addressing the light.

An answer was returned, in the wordless manner before described, to the effect that, when the appearance should next recur, the object of it, Alice, would be close at hand.

Thenceforth, the existence of Mrs. Applebee was a condition of expectation, fidget, and dream. Attaching an undue importance to the visions of the night, the good lady trotted about in fancied obedience to them, no whit discouraged by her frequent disappointments.

One night she had a singularly vivid dream of sitting in the parlor of a temperance hotel, in Abergavenny, and seeing a handsome young man, "likewise pale," said Mrs. Applebee, "who said (don't laugh, 'm, please,) 'you're to come and be our cook.' When I saw Mr. Richard" (with a curtesy,) "I knew he was my young man."

"When I saw him," repeated the old lady, "I knew I should soon see the other (meaning the apparition) also, and shortly find his Alice. I have enough, thanks be to God, to make her comfortable, and so I will, only staying with you, ma'am, as long as ever you pleases to want me.

"And now my story's done, and I don't think, my dears—young ladies, I would say—that you'll hear of any more ghostes at Grisewood Cottage." It is a fact, that they never did.—Once a Week.

It is, perhaps, not generally known to our readers, that a piece of blotting-paper crumpled together to make it firm, and just wetted, will take ink out of mahogany. Rub the spot hard with the wetted paper, when it instantly disappears; and the white mark from the operation may be immediately removed by rubbing the table with cloth.

Every man can and should do something for the public, if it he only to kick a piece of orange peel into the road from the pavement. To do so is the duty of every good man; also, to kick the fellow who threw the peel on the pavement—if he can catch him at it.

A Judge of Pork.—"No man," says Mrs. Partington, "was better calculated to judge of pork than my husband was; he knew what good hogs were, he did, for he had been brought up among 'em from childhood."

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1865.

FRANKLIN TUTHILL.

WITHIN the past few weeks, a singular fatality seems to have pursued the Evening Bulletin. Elevated, through success, experience and influence, above the misfortunes which sometimes attack weaker journals, calamity appears to have struck its only vulnerable part—the life of its editors. On the day that the body of James Nisbet was committed to the grave in this city, Franklin Tuthill breathed his last on the opposite shores of the continent. In the first of these two men our cotemporary lost a senior to whose calm judgment, industry and worth we have lately borne willing witness; in the second, the accomplished and graceful writer whom we are now called upon to mourn.

To say that, as a daily journalist, Dr. Tuthill was the best writer on the coast, is high praise, indeed, yet it does but scant justice to his literary capacity. However indicative it may be of the versatility and practical nature of his talent, it must be remembered that the columns of a daily press offer a poor education for the literary man; that the exigencies of journalism, far from fostering that originality of style which is the basis of all literary excellence, rather tend to absorb all styles in its own, and that individual characteristics and graces are gradually but surely merged in the impersonality of the newspaper. But Dr. Tuthill triumphed over this tendency He brought into the field of journalism a fresh, original nature, a memory stored with facts and handles to fit them; a keen sense of humor, and a strong poetic taste. In spite of himself, quips and puns often found their way into his paragraphs; serious articles sometimes led the reader up to quaint turns of humor totally unexpected, or fascinated him with felicitous similes and figures brought from the various branches of science. Like his professional brother, Holmes, Dr. Tuthill never seemed at a loss for a happy illustration—the most classical and scientific brought no suspicion of pedantry—the humblest and commonest no trace of vulgarity. Readers of the Bulletin during the winter of 1860, when the Doctor seems to have been confined to no particular department of the paper, but roved at will throughout its pages, will remember having detected his characteristic touches in the local columns, now quaintly philosophizing over a lost child, now playfully satirizing some social nuisance, now recording some local entertainment with a grave irony which was his nearest approach to puffery. Nor was the Doctor's humor, although exuberant, ever misapplied or exhibited for humor's sake solely. He used his wit to illustrate, not to dazzle. His more serious and practical labors were equally effective. As a reporter of public meetings, speeches and debates, he added to the mechanical accuracy of the stenographer the higher critical faculty of preserving what was worthy of preservation. His reports were carefully winnowed of chaff, nor did a grain of wheat slip unnoticed through his fingers. The "penn'orth of bread" he retained, and enough "sack" to wash it down, but no more. Himself no mean speaker, orators found in his reports all the sympathy and thoughtful consideration of a brother. His felicitous transcripts of the lectures of the late Thomas Starr King were "gems miraculously set," and no one more heartily acknowledged the genius of the reporter than the orator himself. Mr. King once humorously declared his intention to submit his manuscripts hereafter to the Doctor, and to lecture solely from his reports. It became the privilege of the orator on one occasion to return the courtesy, and to report, albeit to a smaller audience, a speech which Dr. Tuthill delivered to a general gathering of Sunday School children, and which Mr. King enthusiastically declared to have been the best ever delivered on such an occasion.

Had Dr. Tutbill possessed less genius, and had he confined himself to the dull, plodding routine of his profession, we should not probably have been called upon to perform this melancholy duty. The draught horse in harness, who pulls straight ahead, outlasts the thoroughbred who kicks and chafes in the traces and makes "killing" time. People whose brains are "milked every day" soon run dry, and if they are too conscientious to offer chalk and water in place of the pure lacteal fluid, they soon kill themselves. It seems that to the regular labors incidental to his profession, Dr. Tuthill had within the past few years added another work—which becomes now, for the first time, known to the public. He had prepared by exhaustive research, during those hours which are usually set apart for rest and sleep, the materials for a history of California. His failing health, which at least imperatively demanded a cessation of his professional duties, and induced him to go abroad, did not, however, prevent him from completing his cherished scheme. It seems to have been his last effort. We had hoped soon to have welcomed him again, and in those columns where a few months ago his characteristic letter from Spain prepared his old readers to expect so much. But the hand which traced it is cold, and of him nothing remains but the manuscript history of that State, which, being graced by his labors, is partly a history of himself.

NEW BOOKS.

THE following works were received from A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street:

The Squibob Papers. By John Phœnix (Geo. H. Derby.) New York: Carleton.

Everything relating to the late Capt. Geo. H. Derby, in the way of reminiscence or composition, is sought for with avidity. His popularity is perhaps nowhere more strongly shown nor more severely tested than in the publication of the present volume. With the exception of one or two magazine articles, not quite up to the author's usual excellence, it is composed chiefly of letters, pen-and-ink sketches, and other disjecta membra of that wonderfully funny man, who died so full of promise. The humor of this posthumous book is broader and perhaps not quite as carefully wrought and refined as some of John Phœnix' previous essays, but even this broadness is eclipsed by some of the pre-Raphaelite illustrations of the author. The irresistibly comic character of these drawings are so essentially a feature of these "Papers" that we are restrained in our extracts to the following letter, which we do not remember to have met before:

A LETTER OF CREDIT.

August 24, 1856.

My Only Benson:—Your suggestion about the revolting pistols is highly approved by me, and I wish to improve a little on it, by purchasing also, a clarionet (E. flat) for Marlin, and a piccolo, or octavo flute for yourself. With these dulcet instruments, you can sit on the bridge, during the midwatches of the autumnal nights, and breathe forth your saddened spirits in a flood of melody, which shall charm the marine inhabitants of Walewski creek and make the angry and perturbed nature of the murdered Bell, as soft as mercurial ointment. Please send the money for the pistols and musical instruments, and they shall be forwarded without delay.

For the Colt's Revolting pistols, for Marlin		$60
" " " "	Benson	30
" 1 E. flat Clarionet		10
" 1 Piccolo		10
" Extra reeds		1
" Music, a few concerted pieces in B. Minor, arranged for clarionet and piccolo		10
Total		$121

I have not the money by me, or I would advance it as you request.

You could not have supposed the United States Government would furnish arms for the use of overseers on a military road. Do they furnish them for the officers of their armies? No. by my faith, those warriors pay for their own swords: they purchase their own habergeons and surcoats, their targets and bucklers, and if they are fain to indulge in the luxury of a Colt's revolter to strap upon their posteriors, (there to hang in inglorious idleness, for aye,) they have to borrow the money from their friends for that purpose.

Fain would I furnish you and the gallant Marlin each with a suit of Milan armor of tempered steel, inlaid with arabesque work of fine gold; helmets of the same, with a crest of marabout feathers containing four at $1 25 each, swords, shields (with a device representing Bell fishing off Walewski Bridge) habergeons, battle-axes, daggers of mercy; and surcoats and lutes with broad blue ribbon at 3s. per yard for your ladies' bower, but I haven't got the money to spare, and well I am not, if ye seek to come forth in martial guise, your coffers are far better able to supply your armament than is my poor pantaloons pocket. I counsel you therefore, to purchase what you may wish, or make unto yourselves bows and arrows withal to defend yourselves after the manner of our ancient forbears. As to Bell, have I not written unto the sheriffs of Stillacoom and Olympia, praying that he may be suddenly and quickly removed from our midst.

The rope will be sent, the gimbolet is enclosed, (on the outside.) Make more than 2,600 feet per week, and believe me to remain,

With deep admiration,
Your affectionate friend,
G. H. D.

Alfred Hagart's Household. By Alexander Smith. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

Alexander Smith has apparently abandoned poetry for prose. His latest work—Dreamthorpe—was a collection of essays. Alfred Hagart's Household is a quiet narrative, whose incidents are laid in Scotland and whose characters are Scottish. The scope of this little story—it can hardly be called a novel—is somewhat limited, its dramatis personæ are few, but the slightest details are carefully elaborated, and the clever analysis and delicate perception shown in the delineation of the characters of two children betray considerable skill. His portrait of old "Kate McQuarrie," is an evidence that, in applying this same analytical power to age, he has been equally successful.

Song of the Shirt, and other Poems. By Thomas Hood. New York: Bunce & Huntington.

This is the second number of Messrs. Bunce & Huntington's series of the Cottage Library. It has been produced under the editorial supervision of Mr. R. H. Stoddard, the poet, whose critical taste and experience is shown in the vast improvement of this volume over the preceding number. In the present volume Mr. Stoddard has given us a selection of the best of Hood's serious poems, divided into different groups, which might be classified as philanthropic, amatory, and imaginative. But, with the exception of the well-known "I Remember, I Remember," the book is unrelieved by any of those lighter pieces in which the poet was wont to touch simultaneously the mirth and sympathy of his readers. The gloomy and serious complexion given to it by the character of the selections is not only unfair to the memory of the poet, but is calculated to lead unfamiliar readers to believe that Hood's "Other Poems" were all melancholy. Unless it be the intention of the publishers to present his humorous poems in another volume, it may be questioned whether the selection fairly expresses the intention of the series—i. e. of offering to the public the characteristic and familiar verses of their most valued bards. The book is elegantly printed and tastefully illustrated.

Notices of the following are deferred until next week: Dennis Donne, Life of General Grant, Lambert's Human Anatomy, Mildred Arkell, A Summer Ride, Carry's Confession, Trial of the Assassins.

Great Telegraphic Enterprise.—James Street, Esq., who built a large portion of the present overland telegraph and acted as agent of our city government and went to New York at his own expense and contracted for the construction of our fire-alarm and police telegraph, arrived here in the last steamer as agent of a company of heavy capitalists, to begin at once the erection of two separate and distinct telegraphic lines across the Plains—one from San Francisco to St. Louis and one from San Francisco to Chicago. All the money necessary to carry out these vast improvements has been subscribed and deposited in bank in the East, and Mr. Street, who is sole Superintendent of both, in their entire length, is empowered to draw upon Wells, Fargo & Co. for any and all sums he may require in the prosecution of the same. An army of men are already at work on the eastern extremities of the lines, and in a few weeks working parties will be distributed along the route at short intervals from here to the States. Both lines will be finished during the coming year—one in July and the other in October. The necessary wire, insulators, etc., for the Salt Lake and San Francisco division is already on its way to this port from England. The lines hence to Virginia City will be erected and put in working order immediately—the wire for them will reach here by the next steamer. Under Mr. Street's able management the contracts for these new overland lines will be carried out well and thoroughly, and within the stipulated time; and then, good-by to telegraphic monopolies and exorbitant charges.

Testimonial to Gottschalk.—The friends of Mr. Gottschalk surprised him with a fine dinner and an elegant medal on the 25th inst., by way of testifying their appreciation of his abilities as an artist and their esteem for him as a man. The medal was designed and manufactured by Messrs. Tucker & Co., and is in all respects an exquisite piece of workmanship. It is three inches in diameter, a quarter of an inch thick, weighs six ounces, and cost a thousand dollars. It is laced on one side with a miniature flag-stone pavement composed of six pieces of California gold quartz; in the centre are the initials "L. M. G." wrought in diamonds and surrounded by a wreath closely studded with diamonds and rubies held together by one large diamond; attached to the upper rim of the medal is an enamelled bow surmounted by a large ring of diamonds encircling a diamond harp. On the obverse is the California coat of arms beautifully chased, and around it is the inscription—"To L. M. Gottschalk—a token from his California friends, Aug. 25, 1865." The handsome jewel is on exhibition at Tucker & Co.'s, and attracts considerable attention.

Musical Matters.—The benefit tendered to Mr. Maguire on Monday night last was the crowning of the opera season, and did all that a single night's receipts could do towards reimbursing him for the losses he has sustained in fulfilling his late opera contracts. In a business aspect, his loss will be amply made up by the renewed confidence and patronage which his pluck has extorted from the public. The benefit given to the deserving and excellent chorus—the rank and file, to whose efforts much of the artistic success of the past season was due—took place on Friday night. The lateness of the hour prevents our giving an account of the performance, which, judging from the character of the programme, must have been a success.

THE SURPRISING ADVENTURES OF MASTER CHARLES SUMMERTON.

AT exactly half-past nine o'clock on the morning of Saturday, August 26th, 1865, Master Charles Summerton, aged five years, disappeared mysteriously from his paternal residence on Folsom street, San Francisco. At twenty-five minutes past nine he had been observed, by the butcher, amusing himself by going through that popular youthful exercise known as "turning the crab," a feat in which he was singularly proficient. At a court of inquiry summarily held in the back parlor at 10:15, Bridget, cook, deposed to have detected him at twenty minutes past nine, in the felonious abstraction of sugar from the pantry, which, by the same token, had she known what was a comin', she'd have never previuted. Patsey, a shrill-voiced youth from a neighboring alley, testified to having seen "Chowley" at half past nine in front of the butcher's shop round the corner, but as this young gentleman choose to throw out the gratuitous belief that the missing child had been converted into sausages by the butcher, his testimony was received with some caution by the female portion of the court, and with downright scorn and contumely by its masculine members. But whatever might have been the hour of his departure, it was certain that from half-past ten A. M. until nine P. M., when he was brought home by a policeman, Charles Summerton was missing. Being naturally of a reticent disposition, he has since resisted, with but one exception, any attempt to wrest from him a statement of his whereabouts during that period. That exception has been myself. He has related to me the following in the strictest confidence:

His intention on leaving the door-steps of his dwelling was to proceed without delay to Van Dieman's Land, by way of Second and Market streets. This project was subsequently modified so far as to permit a visit to Otahiete, where Capt. Cook was killed. The outfit for his voyage consisted of two car tickets, five cents in silver, a fishing line, the brass capping of a spool of cotton, which, in his eyes, bore some resemblance to metallic currency, and a Sunday school library ticket. His garments, admirably adapted to the exigencies of any climate, were, severally, a straw hat with a pink ribbon, a striped shirt, over which a pair of trousers, uncommonly wide in comparison to their length, were buttoned, striped balmoral stockings which gave his youthful legs something of the appearance of wintergreen candy, and copper-toed shoes with iron heels, capable of striking fire from any flag-stone. This latter quality, Master Charley could not help feeling, would be of infinite service to him in the wilds of Van Diemen's Land, which, as pictorially represented in his geography, seemed to be deficient in corner groceries and matches.

Exactly as the clock struck the half hour, the short legs and straw hat of Master Charles Summerton disappeared around the corner. He ran rapidly, partly by way of inuring himself to the fatigues of the journey before him, and partly by way of testing his speed with that of a North Beach car which was proceeding in his direction. The conductor not being aware of this generous and lofty emulation, and being somewhat concerned at the spectacle of a pair of very short, twinkling legs so far in the rear, stopped his car and generously assisted the youthful Summerton upon the platform. From this point a hiatus of several hours duration occurs in Master Charles' narrative. He is under the impression that he "rode out" not only his two tickets, but that he became subsequently indebted to the company for several trips to and from the opposite termini, and that at last, resolutely refusing to give any explanation of his conduct, he was finally ejected, much to his relief, on a street corner. Although, as he informs us, he felt perfectly satisfied with this arrangement, he was impelled under the circumstances to hurl after the conductor an opprobious appellation which he had ascertained from Patsey was the correct thing in such emergencies, and possessed peculiarly exasperating properties.

We now approach a thrilling part of the narrative, before which most of the adventures of the "Boys' Own Book" pale into insignificance. There are times when the recollection of this adventure causes Master Charles to break out in a cold sweat, and he has several times since its occurrence been awakened by lamentations and outcries in the night season by merely dreaming of it. On the corner of the street lay several large empty sugar hogsheads. A few young gentlemen disported themselves therein, armed with sticks, with which they removed the sugar which still adhered to the joints of the staves, and conveyed it to their mouths. Finding a cask not yet pre-empted, Master Charles set to work, and for a few moments revelled in a wild saccharine dream, from which he was finally roused by an angry voice and the rapidly retreating footsteps of his comrades. An ominous sound smote his ear, and the next moment he felt the cask wherein he lay uplifted and set upright against the wall. He was a prisoner, but as yet undiscovered. Being satisfied in his mind that hanging was the systematic and legalized penalty for the outrage he had committed, he kept down manfully the cry that rose to his lips.

In a few moments he felt the cask again lifted by a powerful hand, which appeared above him at the edge of his prison, and which he concluded belonged to the ferocious giant Blunderbore, whose features and limbs he had frequently met in colored pictures. Before he could recover from his astonishment, his cask was placed with several others on a cart, and rapidly driven away. The ride which ensued, he describes as being fearful in the extreme. Rolled around like a pill in a box, the agonies which he suffered may be hinted at, not spoken. Evidences of that protracted struggle were visible in his garments, which were of the consistency of syrup, and his hair, which for several hours, under the treatment of hot water, yielded a thin treacle. At length the cart stopped on one of the wharves and the cartman began to unload. As he tilted over the cask in which Charles lay, an exclamation broke from his lips, and the edge of the cask fell from his hands, sliding its late occupant upon the wharf. To regain his short legs, and to put the greatest possible distance between himself and the cartman were his first movements on regaining his liberty. He did not stop until he had reached the corner of Front street.

Another blank succeeds in this veracious history. He cannot remember how or when he found himself in front of the circus tent. He has an indistinct recollection of having passed through a long street of stores, which were all closed, and which made him fear that it was Sunday, and that he had spent a miserable night in the sugar cask. But he remembers hearing the sound of music within the tent, and of creeping on his hands and knees, when no one was looking, until he passed under the canvas. His description of the wonders contained within that circle; of the terrific feats which were performed by a man on a pole, since practiced by him in the back yard; of the horses, one of which was spotted and resembled an animal in his Noah's Ark, hitherto unrecognized and undefined, of the female equestrians, whose dresses could only be equalled in magnificence to the frocks of his sister's doll, of the painted clown, whose jokes excited a merriment, somewhat tinged by an undefined fear, was an effort of language which this pen could but weakly transcribe, and which no quantity of exclamation points could sufficiently illustrate. He is not quite certain what followed He remembers that almost immediately on leaving the circus it became dark, and that he fell asleep, waking up at intervals on the corners of the streets, on front steps, in somebody's arms, and finally in his own bed. He was not aware of experiencing any regret for his conduct, he does not recall feeling at at any time a disposition to go home—he remembers distinctly that he felt hungry.

He has made this disclosure in confidence. He wishes it to be respected. He wants to know if you have five cents about you.

A DRAMATIC COMPANY OF FLEAS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH, BY TREM.

THE Vienna Courrier thus speaks of an exhibition which is certainly not unattractive:

Do you remember the rebus of Boileaux-Despreaux?

"A deadly foe to human rest,
Lovers oft envy me my nest;
I feed on blood, yet love not strife,
Am killed by those who give me life."

Yes, dear reader, it is an exhibition of fleas, which every one goes to admire at present. At the word flea many a fair reader will certainly not be able to avoid feeling a certain disgust for this little insect, and we would hardly perhaps wish to write on such a subject, but we engage if all our lady readers had had an opportunity to closely inspect the fleas of which we speak, they would certainly have with one voice cried out, "Oh, the beautiful little things!" and disgust would give way to admiration. These fleas are genuine artists They perform every imaginable feat, and even more. Nothing puzzles them. I have seen vehicles of every description, from the coach to the cart, drawn by fleas.

I have seen them in every description of costume; I have seen them riding, as huzzars, as lancers. I have seen them as artillerymen go through the exercise with a piece of artillery. I have seen them fight a duel with swords, and imagine how small the sword must be which a flea brandishes!

I have seen them seated in the cars of a railway train four inches in length. What pretty travellers!

I have seen them play on a rustic organ in a very free and easy fashion. I have seen a ball-room where fleas danced in full dress, accompanied by an orchestra composed of fleas. I much admired the leader of the orchestra and his baton.

I have seen a flea dressed as a peasant girl, drawing buckets of water at a well. In a word, I have seen extraordinary things, inconceivable performances. They must be seen to be believed.

If one of our charming readers will reflect a moment on the trouble she has sometimes had in catching a flea she can then form some idea of the pains he has had who has trained, educated, civilized all these little insects.

The trainer of these fleas is a man of about sixty years of age, who possesses another talent—that of making the coaches, utensils and instruments used by his fleas. With his sight unassisted by glasses, he makes things which one can scarcely distinguish without the aid of a microscope. I asked their teacher to give me some information concerning his pupils. This is what I learned:

The training of the fleas lasts some months. The artistes, who refuse with disdain any food but human blood, generally live two years. They are allowed two meals a day; then their trainer extends his bare arm, and lets each member of his talented troupe suck a drop of blood. The troupe is composed of sixty-five fleas, and when one thinks that the director has for more than twenty years been engaged in training this species of insect, one can imagine how his arms ought to look.

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's Opera House the talented Worrell sisters have joined the company. Little Jennie appears to have learned much by her trip in the mountains; she is becoming quite a finished little actress. Miss Sophie Worrell will in course of time, become a very good actress in burlesque parts. Miss Irene has to depend upon her sweet voice and graceful dancing, more than on any dramatic talent which she possesses to render her a favorite. Cinderella was produced in capital style, and the fairy transformation effects were very well managed. Last night, Columbian Engine Co. No. 11, took a benefit, and it was well attended. The funny impersonations of Mr. Setchell, and the burlesque performances of the Worrell sisters, will serve to fill up time very acceptably until the stately Vestvali makes her appearance to receive the homage of the lovers of art and beauty. Camea is chosen for her first appearance; the comparisons made between the "gifted Heron's" rendition of that character and Vestvali's will not, I fancy, be complimentary to the former. Vestvali is graceful, tall, and altogether magnificent, Heron was—well, Heron wasn't. This afternoon, Lend Me Five Shillings, and Cinderella, will be performed. In the evening, The Dutch Governor and The Maid and the Magpie form the bill.

At Wheatleigh's Eureka, Scotch drama has held the stage, and Mr. Shiels has steadily advanced in popular favor. His "Dandie Dinmont" in Guy Mannering, and "Jock Muir" in Gilderoy, are admirable personations. When the leading lady whom Wheatleigh has in his eye, joins the Eureka, this company will be strong enough with Messrs. Wheatleigh, Shiels, and Leach, who are undeniably good, to produce pieces in which there are good female characters, but at present the fewer of these there are in a play the better it is. Miss Clarkson, though she evinces gratifying signs of improvement in her profession, and played "Lilias Logan" in Gilderoy with more life than she has displayed for some time, is not yet far enough advanced for leading business, and female talent is sadly wanted at the Eureka. Mr. Wheatleigh has received the models necessary for the construction of the machinery used in the production of Arrah-na-Pogue, and in the course of a week or two we shall probably have the pleasure of witnessing Boucicault's last production, and I hope Mr. Wheatleigh will be repaid for the outlay he has incurred in securing the right of playing this piece in California. This afternoon the Eureka offers the Gilderoy Matinée; in the evening Crammond Brig, Model of a Wife, and Gilderoy.

The Buislay Family in conjunction with Wilson's grand circus continue to astonish crowds of spectators with their fearfully dangerous feats. This afternoon the remaining members of this talented family will appear, and new feats will be performed, some of which have never before been accomplished in the United States by any gymnasts.

TOUCHSTONE.

STEAMSHIP LINE TO CHINA.—The telegraph informs us that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company have received the Government contract for carrying the United States mails to China. The subsidy for the service is to be half a million dollars per annum for ten years, from January 1867. The Company are building four first-class and first-speed American side-wheel steamships, of from 3,500 to 4,000 tons burden, and are to make at least twelve round trips per annum between San Francisco and Hongkong, touching at Honolulu and Kanagawa. The past record of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company is a sufficient guarantee that the new line will be based upon liberal and energetic management, and the commercial interests of our State have cause for thankfulness that the contract has been given to a company that will serve the public interest as well as their own, in place of being awarded to Vanderbilt or some other modern "pirate."

SAN FRANCISCO PUCK.—The September number of this really clever periodical shows no falling off in the excellence of its illustrations, or the wit and humor of its contributions. The cartoon entitled "The Mexican Belshazzar," has signal merit. Its central figure—Uncle Sam writing the ominous "Mene Tekel" upon the walls of Maximilian's palace—is one of the cleverest delineations of the Yankee character we have ever seen, as powerful and as original as Wheatleigh's "Salem Scudder." Altogether, Puck is a credit to our young civilization, and can compete fairly with the best satirical productions of the Atlantic coast.

LETTER FROM "ROBIN HOOD."

SUMMIT CITY, Cal., August 22d, 1865.

EVERYBODY has read the story in the Arabian Nights, how a traveller going to bed in a dreary castle situated on a lonely heath, was, on waking the next morning, greeted with the sight from his window of a populous and thriving city on the very spot where, the night previous, was nothing but a blank tenantless spot. I am not going to comment on the above story, nor raise the question whether the city referred to was ever there or not; but I am going to relate a few facts of the "American Knights" of the pick and shovel and spade, that will compare very favorably with the above story in its marvellous element, and certainly outstrips it—on the point of veracity.

Four weeks ago, a miner coming to this district to prospect, would not have met with a single habitation, if we except two or three rough log-cabins. To-day, on this very spot, is a town consisting of over 120 houses, with a population, in and about, of 1,500 persons, almost every conceivable business being carried on, and the population daily increasing. The name of this place is Summit City, Excelsior District, Nevada county. It is situated on the western shore of Meadow Lake, a quiet sheet of water about a mile and a half long and about three-quarters of a mile wide. The town is well laid out, on almost a level plain, with facilities for extension, north, west and south. The whole of it has been already pre-empted, and building lots are actually selling to-day as high as $700.

The cause of this miracle was the discovery of rich gold ledges in the neighborhood. These ledges were spoken of in the papers, some time since, but it was only lately that the inhabitants of Washoe caught the excitement. Perhaps the fact of their catching it so suddenly, accounts for their having it so bad. At any rate, men suddenly began to rush out here, some bringing their families along, and in a couple of days they would have a house to stow themselves in—bivouacking, in the meantime, as in the days of '49. Virginia, Gold Hill, Carson, and the neighboring towns, are all getting rid of a large proportion of their surplus population, who come out here with the hope of making their pile, and are added to the population of Excelsior.

The rocks on the neighboring ledges are undoubtedly rich. Some men are already panning out good wages; but the question is, whether the rock below is as rich as the top indicates. If this turns out to be the case—and it will be decided very shortly, for they will soon have a couple of mills here—then this will compare very favorably with any mining section in California; and at any rate, the surface diggings are going to pay for some time.

The climate is very healthy, and just now exceedingly mild; but the country has one great drawback, namely, the winters are exceedingly severe. The snow falls sometimes to the depth of twelve or fifteen feet, and a gentleman tells me has found snow here in the early part of July. This will therefore make it exceedingly difficult if not altogether impossible, to work during the Winter. Nevertheless, it is the intention of several who are now here to remain over Winter—or until they 're driven out.

At all events, I have every reason to believe that next Spring times will be exceedingly lively here. The country will not have been near prospected by that time, so that one good year at least to business men who settle here is in prospect. They are talking of building a road through to Dutch Flat, a distance of about twenty-four miles, which of course will greatly increase the travel to this section.

At night-time the town presents a very lively appearance. Fires are lighted at short intervals in the two principal streets; music is playing; hurdy houses are in full blast, and the saloons reap quite a harvest of halves and quarters. Almost every other house is a lodging or hoarding house, notwithstanding which, many a man has to find shelter under some friendly tree for the night; and the report that there are bears in the neighborhood must be sweet consolation to those who have to bunk outside; but such is life in Excelsior.

ROBIN HOOD.

A GUARDED ANSWER.—In one of our courts lately a man who was called upon to appear as a witness could not be found. On the judge asking where he was, an elderly gentleman rose up, and with much emphasis said, "Your honor, he's gone!" "Gone! gone!" said the Judge, "where is he gone?" "That I cannot inform you," replied the communicative gentleman, "but he is dead." This is considered the best guarded answer on record.

BARNUM AND LEDRU ROLLIN.—After Barnum's book had appeared, and after the clock speculation had taken an unfortunate turn, he wrote to this distinguished Frenchman, stating that he intended to revisit Europe and exhibit Tom Thumb. Rollin replied in something of this strain:

"Dear Sir—Let Tom Thumb exhibit you, who are by far the greater curiosity of the two.

"Je suis, etc., L. ROLLIN."

AN INDIA RUBBER BOOK.

CHARLES GOODYEAR has lately published what may be literally termed a Book on India-rubber. The North American Review gives the following description of its external phenomena:

"The work presents at least something unique in the art of book-making. It is self-illustrating; inasmuch as, treating of India-rubber, it is made of India-rubber. An unobservant reader, however, would scarcely suspect the fact before reading the preface, for the India-rubber covers resemble highly polished ebony, and the leaves have the appearance of ancient paper worn soft, thin and dingy by numberless perusals. The volume contains six hundred and twenty pages; but it is not as thick as copies of the same work printed on paper, though it is a little heavier. It is evident that the substance of which this book is composed cannot be India-rubber in its natural state. These leaves, thinner than paper, can be stretched only by a strong pull, and resume their shape perfectly when they are let go. There is no smell of India-rubber about them. We first saw this book in a cold room last January, but the leaves were then as flexible as old paper; and when, since, we have handled it in warm weather, they had grown no softer.

"Some of our readers may have heard Daniel Webster relate the story of the India-rubber cloak and hat which one of his New York friends sent him at Marshfield in the infancy of the manufacture. He took the cloak to the piazza one cold morning, when it instantly became as rigid as sheet iron. Finding that it stood alone, he placed the hat upon it, and left the articles standing near the front door. Several of his neighbors who passed, seeing a dark and portly figure there, took it for the lord of the mansion, and gave it respectful salutation. The same articles were liable to an objection still more serious. In the sun, even in cool weather, they became sticky, while on a hot day they would melt entirely away to the consistency of molasses. Every one remembers the thick and ill-shaped India-rubber shoes of twenty years ago, which had to be thawed out under the stove before they could be put on, and which, if left under the stove too long, would dissolve into gum that no household art could ever harden again. Some decorous gentlemen among us can also remember that, in the nocturnal combats of their college days, a fluty India-rubber shoe, in cold weather, was a missive weapon of a highly effective character. This curious volume, therefore, cannot be made of the unmanageable stuff which Daniel Webster set up at his front door. So much is evident at a glance. But the book itself tells us that it can be subjected, without injury, to tests more severe than summer's sun and winter's cold. It can be soaked six months in a pail of water, and still be as good a book as ever. It can be boiled; it can be baked in an oven hot enough to cook a turkey; it can be soaked in brine, lye, camphene, turpentine, or oil; it can be dipped into oil of vitriol, and still no harm done. To crown its merits, no rat, mouse, worm, or moth has shown the slightest inclination to make acquaintance with it. The office of a Review is not usually provided with the means of subjecting literature to such critical tests as lye, vitriol, boilers, and hot ovens. But we have seen enough elsewhere of the ordeals to which India-rubber is now subjected to believe Mr. Goodyear's statements. Remote posterity will enjoy the fruit of his labors, unless some one takes particular pains to destroy this book; for it seems that time itself produces no effect upon the India-rubber which bears the familiar stamp, "Goodyear's Patent." In the dampest corner of the dampest cellar no mould gathers upon it no decay penetrates it. In the hottest garret it never warps or cracks."

"BEASTLY" INTOXICATION.—The most remarkable case of intoxication we ever heard of is related by the Troy Times. About a month ago an illicit whisky distillery was in full blast on Green Island, near Troy. One night—it was a "still" night—the man running the machine had made eighteen gallons of whisky, and put it out in the open air to cool. Along came a cow. She was thirsty, and the beverage looked inviting. She swallowed every drop—eighteen gallons of unrectified whisky, warranted to kill at forty rods. The cow has been drunk ever since. She staggered home and is now in the fourth week of a grand old bender. The cow eats nothing; falls down whenever they try to raise her up; and has become as lean as a crow instead of a cow. This cow, besides, had a young calf, whose strange behavior first led to the discovery of the state of the mother cow. It reeled round and round, and lifting three legs and a tail in the air, actually spun on the fourth leg. The owner of the cow was an orthodox deacon, who had been led by Gough to leave off intoxicating beverages. Being of scientific habits he tasted the milk of the cow, to see what had produced such strange symptoms. He found it was milk punch, and, having once tasted he continued drinking, and it was the quantity thus taken from the animal by man and calf that made her as lean "as a crow." Chemical analysis proves that the casein had all changed to whisky; but the deacon will have to relate his experience to a consistory of farmers, to have his story believed and recover his upright position. Whether the cow will ever get sober, or end her life in a fit of delirium tremens, is a question which we shall look anxiously to see the solution of.

THE PRAYING MANTIS.

PERHAPS the most singular of all the entomological wonders with which the investigation of Natural History has made us acquainted, is the "Praying Mantis" of Brazil, popularly known in all the regions he inhabits as The Walking Leaf—named thus, undoubtedly, from his almost exact resemblance to the dry, dead brown of the peach or olive tree.

I have never seen a specimen Mantis in any entomological collection, or found him classed in any work upon Natural History. Indeed, the only mention that I have ever seen made of the insect, was an imperfect, incorrect sketch in a number of the London Mirror, printed in the year 1826.

Practically, it is of very little importance, probably, whether the Mantis is ever recorded and classed, or not; but, as a curiosity, the insect is worth a glance, and so I present him in a small way, something as I found him in Brazil.

It is only in particular districts in the interior of the country that the Mantis is found, and only at intervals that they are seen in any great numbers at one time. But there are instances when they literally fill the air, and cover the surface of the earth, over a considerable territory, like a flight of Arabian locusts.

These occasions are the war times of the Mantis; for they are a belligerent race—pitching their battles in vast array, charging upon each other always in the air, at an elevation of from five to fifteen feet above the surface; slashing at their antagonists like cavalrymen, with their long, sabre-shaped legs, and fighting out their feud with inconceivable fury, covering, often times, the surface of the ground with the slain—there are no wounded, for a Mantis soldier always slashes to kill.

They are cannibals, too—these shrivelled, dried-up savages, and when the battle is ended, the victors fall to upon the slain, devouring them so long as a carcass remains. Not much of a meal, even for a Mantis, you would suppose—one of these walking leaves; considering that although he is two and a half inches in length, and nearly an inch deep, vertically, with wings closed, body and all, he is scarcely the sixteenth of an inch in thickness, semi-transparent, and not a thousandth part of a drop of blood or any kind of moisture, in a million of them.

The Mantis is a quiet, harmless fellow as far as humanity is concerned. There is no venom in him; he never bites, nor does he in any instance ever prey upon vegetables, as the locust and grasshopper does.

Taking a Mantis in the palm of the hand, you will see him directly sit himself up on end very much like a dog, or rather as a dog does—toss back behind him his long, slender antennæ, raise one of his singular, sabre-shaped fore-legs, and continue to point steadily in one direction with it as long as you hold him in your hand. When a Brazilian campaniero becomes lost in the sierra, he takes a Mantis in his hand, notes the direction in which he points, and follows it home. He claims that the Walking Leaf never misleads him. This of course, is only a foolish superstition, but the Mantis is certainly a very sagacious, as well as a most singular insect.—Correspondence Philadelphia Post.

CURE OF HYDROPHOBIA.—The efficacy of Dr. Buisson's sudorific treatment of hydrophobia, as reported in these columns, is confirmed by the Revue des Provinces, which quotes the following from a journal printed in 1830: "I remember," says the narrator, "a man who formerly lived in the same place as I did, and who was unfortunate enough to be bitten by a mad-dog. Some time after, he fell ill, and very soon appeared all the symptoms of hydrophobia, which became so violent that his friends resolved to terminate his sufferings by suffocating him. To accomplish this dreadful design, four of them extended a feather bed on the floor, threw the unhappy man upon it, and covered him with a second bed, on which they placed themselves to press upon and smother him. During this time, his wife was held in the adjoining room by some of her relations. The state of this unhappy woman may be imagined during the struggles and groans of the sufferer. She remained at first apparently stupefied, but when a frightful silence had succeeded the tumult, she seemed to break loose from her apathy; the full horror of the scene rushed upon her mind, and, with a shriek of despair, she rushed into the chamber of death. With superhuman force, she threw aside the men who were holding her husband down, and pulled away the bed which covered him. Life had almost departed, but respiration was soon re-established, and at last he opened his eyes. The efforts he made had covered him with so profuse a perspiration that it ran in streams from the whole of his body. He was calm, and, a short time after, to the astonishment of all present, announced that the symptoms of his cruel malady had quitted him. The man lived long after, had a numerous family, and never felt any recurrences of the attack."—Galignani.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"TAKE away this chimmy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Campagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

Mr. Henry P. Thomas, who came in yesterday from the New Truckee District, informs us that in a sort of cave near the hot springs, not far from Say's Station, an immense toad has been found. It is about three feet long and two feet broad across the back. Its weight is supposed to be not less than seventy pounds. When disturbed it moves about, making a puffing noise. It is a black, ugly monster, with warts on its body as large as a medium-sized potato, and has a mouth that opens like the jaws of a carpet sack.—Territorial Enterprise.

At 11 o'clock August 27th, a fire caught in the wild oats on the Aromas Rancho, about three miles from San Juan, which burned over the whole face of the country for about three miles square. The total loss is estimated at from $6,000 to $8,000. The heaviest loser is Henry Miller, of San Francisco, who lost a large quantity of hay, barley, lumber, and fence. A large number of men were engaged in fighting the fire, and did not succeed in quelling it until six o'clock in the evening. Origin, a camp fire.

A gentleman from Poker Flat, who is somewhat a confidante of Chinamen, and understands their language more or less, informs us that it was currently reported in Chinese circles that about ten days since a Chinaman, working with a party of eight others, found a chunk of gold weighing nine pounds, up the North Fork above this place. Chinamen for some reason rarely tell their good luck in these parts.—Downieville Messenger.

S. P. Storms, a California Pioneer, died at Virgin Bay, Central América, June 28th, aged thirty-three. On the 13th of January, 1849, he left Bostou in the ship Edward Everett for California, arriving, in company with one hundred and forty-nine others, owners of the vessel and cargo, at San Francisco on the 7th of July following.

The Aurora Union of August 12th says sage hens were never so abundant since the country was first settled by white men as they are this season. Last week two gentlemen went a short dislance from town and killed seventy-seven iu one day.

A man named Kramer was murdered by highwaymen, lately, in a gulch between Chinese Camp and Dutch Bar. The murdered man had gone to Chinese Camp for the purpose of exchangiug some gold dust, and was killed on his way back. The bloody deed was performed with a hatchet.

We saw a limb taken from a tree in Mr. Bettis' yard, at McSorley's saloon, which beats them all. The limb was twenty-two inches long and contained ninety-one large green gage plums.—Nevada National.

Mr. Morgan, while riding a wild horse on Floyd's ranch, Cherokee Lane, about five miles from Stockton, on Friday evening, August 25th, was thrown to the ground, breaking his neck.

Mrs. Sullivan, living at Sutterville, was reported drowned. Subsequently she called on the Coroner, and informed him that she was alive. The woman drowned was Katrina Dauber, of Newcastle, Placer county. The deceased was 73 years old.

A few days since, Thomas Scanlon was instantly killed by a falling tree, while working on the road between Webber's Station, on the Dutch Flat road, and Summit City. Mr. Scanlon was from Virginia City.

Jacob Goin, at one time a stage driver from Marysville, was seriously wounded at Virginia City on the 22d ultimo in a shooting affray with French Farrington.

A locomotive is being built in this city for the Napa Vally Railway.

A citizen of Petaluma was shot through the arm while entering his house, by his son, who mistook him for a robber.

Firemen's Funeral.—The funeral of Walter J. Bohen, foreman, and James C. Washingtou member of Engine Co. No. 6, who were fatally injured by being run over on the morniug of Monday, 21st ultimo, while guidiug the engine down the Washington street grade to the fire at the Niantic Hotel, were very numerously attended by both the Department and citizens yesterday afternoon. They were both worthy young men, in full health and vigor of life, who received their fatal injuries nearly at the same moment; and after days of suspense and suffering Death placed their names on his roll-call nearly at the same time.

The Colfax Banquet.—A superb banquet and ball were given to the Colfax party on Thursday evening at the Occidental Hotel, at which upwards of two hundred of the best citizens of San Francisco were present. The supper, which was the most sumptuous that could be provided, was set in the reading room, and the dance came off in the great dining-room; the ornamentation of both of these apartments was the most tasteful we have yet witnessed upon any similar occasion in the city. Mr. Colfax will take his departure to-day for the States.

PARIS HACKMEN ON A STRIKE.

THE hackmen of Paris have lately struck for higher wages. "Spiridion," in the Saturday Evening Gazette, among several amusing incidents of the strike gives the following: "The hack company was busy all this day in attempting to recruit, in the neighborhood of Paris, persons to supply the drivers on strike. It offered to these a carriage and horses to drive with 3f. wages a day and as many vails as they could get. It offered to give those who possessed carriages the right to exercise the trade of hackmen in Paris. The consequences of these measures were visible the second day of the strike. Hacks were again to be seen in our streets. The Chelsea quiet fled. The drivers were, however, recruited by Sir John Falstaff—surely since his regiment was disbanded never was so sorry a collection of human beings assembled. The majority of them were in caps and blouses; they had not shaved for at least three days; and they appeared to be as ignorant of the virtues of soap and water as of transcendental mathematics. I saw some lads of sixteen among them. Two women were on the box. It was amusing to see them at the corners. They would make as much ceremony with the coming carriage if it was within reasonable distance as two German peeresses whose pedigree and titles were of precisely equal worth would make upon entrance to a stateroom. Their politeness was often ill rewarded; sometimes an omnibus would swing around suddenly and while their Jehus in partibus infidelium were telegraphing their courteous temper, 'bus would give the hind wheels of the hack a blow which would send horse and hack several yards forward. The expression of Jehu's face at this moment was comical: it looked utterly bewildered, the eyes were of enormous size, and the mouth was screwed to an uncertain point, ignorant whether it should grin or blubber. Their awkwardness was as great as their politeness. In their rural simplicity they were unconscious of the uses of sidewalks, and in turning corners or in press of carriages they regarded the presence of one side of wheels on the sidewalk and the other in the curb-stone drain with stoical indifference. This ancient philosophy did not altogether agree with the passengers, especially if they were from the provinces. I saw one stoic contrive by a miracle of awkwardness to get one side of wheels so high on a pile of building timber which lay on the street that the vehicle was actually suspended. The screams of the passengers brought the carriage to a halt. They get out with great difficulty, and one of them, a young woman of nearly nineteen, almost fainted when she reached the pavement. They declined entrusting themselves again to such a driver. Nobody hired carriages after dark. It was believed that their extemporized drivers presented no security for good conduct, that many of them were ticket-of-leave men, and that if anybody was so unwary as to get into their hack they would be driven to some out of the way spot and then robbed and perhaps murdered. It is said there were some very desperate characters enlisted in the hack service; but as the police were unusually active and vigilant, no great danger really existed. There were more amusing than tragical scenes.

"One of the most laughable occurrences happened to a well-known writer here, and I give you his account of it: 'I took at the Madeleine yesterday a cabriolet driven by a volunteer, probably a countryman, who took advantage of the chance of seeing Paris. I told him my destination, Rue Jacob. He scratched his head, whipped up his horses, who went. I must confess, admirably—so well that it was with the utmost difficulty I could stop him, for the fellow was carrying me off to Montmartre. I showed the driver that our way lay by the Rue de Richelieu which seemed to excite his great surprise, for when we reached the Library he turned and said to me: 'I don't believe there is an end to this street!' When we reached the Rue St. Honore he seemed more at home and said: 'I know where I am now, sir; I am going to cross the Pont des Arts.' I replied: 'Why villager! don't you know that the Point des Arts is reserved for foot passengers only?' This argument brought him to a full halt. I took pity on him and on myself, I got on the box by his side and directed him in the proper way. 'Turn to the right—that's it. Enter the arch of the Carrousel—not this—t'other, the one reserved for carriages coming from the Rue de Rivoli.' He exclaimed: 'I tell you what 'tis, sir, this is a magnificent place.' 'Yes, it is the Place du Carrousel.' 'Indeed! Indeed! Don't the Emperor live somewhere about here!' 'Yes, there, in the Palace of the Tuileries.' 'And that is the Louvre?' 'Brand new as you see.' 'Then we can't be very far from the river?' 'Old fellow, if intriguers have not diverted it from its channel since this morning you will see it flowing under the Point des Saints-Peres.' 'I tell you Paris is a great town any how! It takes a fellow who is up to snuff to find his way about here.' In this way I reached my destination, and it only cost me thirty sous to show a portion of Paris to this countryman.' How shall I describe to you the vehicles which the neighborhood of Paris sent to our streets! You cannot imagine a more ludicrous sight. Our streets seemed to present a caricature of coach making. I saw a great many vehicles which I thought must inevitably fall to pieces before they could get around the neighboring corner. There were wheels which seemed intoxicated, so excessive were the angles they described. I say nothing of the impossible combinations of colors which defied all of Chevreul's theories. The tide of life seemed to have, in a single night, run back thirty or forty or fifty years. If you can conceive this motly assemby of vehicles driven by horses of all varieties, with awkward and uncouth drivers perched on the boxes, and the public promenades lined with jeering spectators, you may have some idea of Paris during the hackmen's strike. It was not without its dangers. We came very near having bloody riots; but the Police managed everything well, and all ended with a few hundred arrests.

A MODERN UPAS.

"WANDERER" contributes to the Mazatlan Times an interesting description of Socorro Island, distant some 300 miles southwest of Mazatlan, which, among other remarkable features, contains a species of poisonous tree:

"We encamped beneath the thick foliage of the trees, little thinking of the evil effects they would produce upon us, and prospected in different directions for water. The travelling on foot was difficult and laborious, on account of the sharp loose stones, overgrown with rank coarse grass and a stiff, unyielding brush. Thus our attempts to penetrate the mountainous regions of the interior under a vertical sun were rendered most intolerable. After spending three days in these attempts we found no water. The little we had on board caused no little anxiety in my mind of the dreadful anticipation of suffering from the pangs of thirst at sea. On the third day Capt. Simpton, after a most tedious and toilsome ramble in search of water, became suddenly blind, and it was with much difficulty that we approached near enough to enable us to hear him halloo. We immediately went after and led him in. After bathing his eyes often in salt water during the day, he was partially relieved—sufficiently so to go on board, but he felt the effects for several days. The Indian boy Ricardo was attacked in the same way, and even worse; his eyes and face were much swollen, and he was unable to see for several days, and finally had an attack of fever. We attributed these maladies to having been produced by sleeping beneath the poisonous trees among which we were encamped. These trees when cut or bruised eject a thick, milky sap; the bark is smooth, the wood soft, the leaf ovate, smooth and of a light green color. The fruit resembles small green apples, and contains a profusion of milky sap. Upon this fruit the parrots there found subsist almost entirely. The fact of all these annoyances determined us to quit a place so inhospitable, where

> "'Flowers whose wild odors breathe but agonies,
> And trees whose gums are poison.'"

It would seem that these are not the only pheuomena of this lonely island. "Wanderer" says:

"There is a very extraordinary point of rocks at the south-east entrance of our little bay, and one that can never be mistaken. It is of a colossal figure, as though shaped with a sculptor's chisel, a perfect form of a robust man, with arms folded, in a sitting position, upon an isolated rock looking out upon the eternal sea, whilst at its base the breakers dash with fury. Our captain called it a petrified Robinson Crusoe. I have taken a sketch of this remarkable point, as of many others about the island, which will eventually appear in my forthcoming work on the birds of Western Mexico."

The Connecticut Life Insurance Company, organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. Bigelow & Brother are General Agents for California.

The display of rich silks exhibited by Kerby, Byrne & Co., at the Industrial Fair, proves that for elegance and exquisite taste their stock cannot be excelled. The style of showing off to advantage twenty-five very rich and expensive silk dresses in a glass case, is very complete. The very elaborate embroideries and real laces serve very much to give a telling effect to the appearance of the display. Kerby, Byrne & Co.'s new styles in cloaks are gotten up equal to any imported; in fact, the workmanship on their cloaks is so much better than any before attempted in San Francisco, that orders for the new styles are given much faster than they can be filled. By the crowd always to be seen in the vicinity of Kerby, Byrne & Co.'s well fitted up and handsome department of the Fair, we should judge that the ladies largely appreciate K., B. & Co.'s efforts to please and gratify their taste for the beautiful.—San Francisco Daily Morning Call.

HOME MANUFACTURES.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

RARE CHANCE
TO SECURE
DESIRABLE HOMESTEADS.

THE CALIFORNIA HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION HAS been formed to enable its members, by paying a few dollars monthly, to obtain desirable Homesteads in the city of San Francisco. In order to secure a beautiful location, as well as cheap property, they have selected Block 540, bounded by Broderick, Pine, Baker and California streets, and Block 541, bounded by Broderick, California, Baker and Sacramento streets, all of the Western Addition. The property is within three blocks of the Central Railroad, and can be reached in a few minutes from the centre of the city. It is covered with fine trees and shrubbery, is sheltered from the winds, and is in every way most eligibly located for homestead purposes.

The lots are, nearly all, 27 1-2 feet front by 137 1-2 feet deep. The Capital Stock is divided into 69 shares, of $250 each. Shareholders will pay $10 per month on each share taken for the term of 25 months. When six monthly payments been made, the property will be divided among the members, and they will receive contracts for deeds to the lots to which they will be entitled, that will enable them to take possession of the same, and erect buildings thereon. In no other way can Homestead Lots in this city be thus easily obtained, and for so small an outlay.

Parties who may wish to subscribe to the Capital Stock, can see a map of the property and obtain full particulars, by calling at the office of the Secretary, 305 Montgomery street, corner of Pine. The title to the property is perfect.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM
—OF—
WILD CHERRY,
HAS BEEN USED FOR
NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,
With the most astonishing success in curing
Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of
The Throat, Lungs and Chest,
INCLUDING EVEN
CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of
has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

THE CUNNING OF LUNACY.

A STRAY LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

WALKING leisurely up Fleet street, one afternoon, after I had finished a tiresome day's work in the counting-house, I felt some person catch my left arm. I turned and saw my old friend S. R. He laughed and said: "You are just the person I want if you have a quarter-hour to spare and will let me bore you with a bit of Lunacy. I have just now parted with a poor fellow, of respectable connections, who is as mad as a March hare upon the subject of perpetual motion, and I had difficulty in breaking away from him; but my story is not on perpetual motion—it is something better than that which seems to be the madman's favorite problem."

With this I went with him to his chambers. I sat down by his table, and he turned over some papers and took up a small packet, saying: "Last week I had this sent me from the country—I'll read it over to you. The man who sends it to me wishes to know if he can have any redress for the degradation he has suffered. I say, No—it is only an exemplification of the cunning sometimes exercised by lunatics; and as his remedy would only be against such a person, the very tale of his misadventure, when related in court, would produce roars of laughter—this would be his only compensation, but making the matter public in a court of law would fasten it upon him among all his neighborhood for the rest of his life. Now only a few of his neighbors and friends know anything of it, and in the course of a little time, like most events in our lives, it will die away and be no more thought of. That is the best and kindest advice I can give him—let it alone; take no farther notice of it. It is true he has some property, and it might bring me a good bill of costs—but that would not be acting justly by such a man, and if he is not a thorough blockhead of a fellow, I think he will follow my advice, and in the end thank me for saving him from being laughed at and being made the subject of never-ending fun and ridicule in his neighborhood, and, in the hands of some malevolent persons, doing him harm in his business."

"But," I said, "what is this queer story of fun about?" "Don't be in a hurry, my friend—I'll read it to you, and if it do not make you laugh as much as it has me, I shall set you down as a very obtuse, thickheaded fellow—begging your pardon as an old friend." "Let us have the story and the laugh then," I said. So he unfolded the paper and read as follows:

"'In July last, a parish officer (the overseer) named Johnson, from the neighborhood of Middleton, Lancashire, undertook to convey a lunatic to the asylum at Lancaster, pursuant to an order signed by two magistrates. As the afflicted man was respectably connected, a gig was hired for the purpose, and he was persuaded that he was going on an excursion of pleasure. In the course of the journey, however, something occurred to arouse his suspicions, but he said nothing on the subject, made no resistance, and seemed to enjoy his jaunt. When they arrived at Lancaster it was too late in the evening to proceed to the asylum, and they took up their quarters for the night at an inn. The lunatic got up very early in the morning and searched the pockets of the sleeping officer, where he found the magistrates' order for his own detention. With that cunning which madmen not unfrequently display, he left the room and made the best of his way to the asylum. Ringing the bell, the door was quickly opened, and he told one of the keepers who presented himself, that he had got a sad mad fellow down at Lancaster whom he should bring up in the course of the day, adding, 'He's a very queer fellow and has got very odd ways; for instance, I should not wonder if he was to say I was the madman, and that he was bringing me, but you must take care of him and not believe a word he says.' The keeper of course very politely promised compliance, and the lunatic returned to the inn where he found the overseer still fast asleep. He woke him up and they sat down to breakfast together, and he said: 'You are a very lazy fellow to be lying in bed all day; I have had a good long walk this morning.' 'Indeed,' said the overseer, 'I should like to have a walk myself after breakfast; perhaps you will go with me.' The lunatic assented, and after breakfast they set out, the overseer leading the way, intending to deliver his charge. When they came within sight of the asylum, the lunatic exclaimed: 'What a fine house that is!' 'Yes,' said the overseer. 'I should like to see the inside of it,' replied the lunatic. 'So should I,' observed the other, 'I dare say they'll let us look through; however, I'll ask.' The overseer then rang the bell, and the keeper whom the lunatic had previously seen made his appearance with two or three assistants. The overseer then began to fumble in his pockets for the order, while the lunatic very gravely produced it to the keeper, saying: 'This is the man I spoke to you about; you will take care of him, shave his head and put a strait waistcoat on him.' The assistants immediately laid hands on the overseer, who vociferated loudly that the other was the madman and he was the keeper; but this only tended to confirm the story previously told by the lunatic. The overseer was taken away, and became so very obstreporous that a strait waistcoat was put upon him, and his head was shaved secundum artem. In the meanwhile the lunatic deliberately walked back to the inn, paid the reckoning, and set out on his journey homeward. The good people of his parish were of course not a little surprized at seeing the wrong man return, they were afraid that in a fit of frenzy he had murdered the overseer, and asked him with some trepidation what he had done with his companion. 'Done with him?' said the madman, 'why, I left him at Lancaster asylum of course, mad—mad as need be.' This was not far from the truth, for the wits of the overseer had been nearly upset by his unexpected detention and subsequent treatment. Inquiry was immediately made, and it being ascertained that the overseer was actually in the asylum, a magistrate's order was at once procured for his liberation: and he returned home with a handkerchief tied round his head instead of its natural covering, which the barber of the asylum had deprived him of.

"Well," I said, as soon as I had recovered my breath from laughing, "that is a ludicrous affair, but I think you are quite right to advise the man to put up with it; for he would only make the joke against himself much more known, and he would never get quit of it."

"That is my candid opinion and advice to him," said S. R. "You know, old fellow, or you ought to know, that I have had something to do with cases of lunacy. There was the celebrated case of E. D., the tea merchant, in which I had the assistance of Sir Edward Sugden and Mr., now Lord Brougham, and after a fourteen days trial, in which Lord Lyndhurst, then Lord Chancellor, took great interest, I gained the day.

"By-the-by, that reminds me of Mr. Brougham. The evening before the trial began we held a consultation, for there were five of us engaged, and were examining the list of jurors as to who should be objected to the next morning—and one of the first on the list was a Mr. McWilliam, a magistrate for Middlesex. He happened to be well known to Mr. Brougham, who, in his usual broad, northern county dialect, made this characteristic remark: 'I know McWilliam very well—he is a good fellow if on our side, but if he should take a crotchet against us he'll work with a ten-mule power; so we had better put him out;' which was accordingly done, and he was struck from the list of jurors."

I could not help smiling at the shrewdness of Mr. Brougham, but my friend continuing his remarks, said:

"You know that pretty place, Epping Forest?"

"Yes," I said. "Often have I been there in different parts."

"Well," he replied. "Did you ever meet with my friend, Dr. Allen, who resides at High Beach, a charming spot on the edge of the Forest." I expressed my ignorance of the doctor. "Well," said my friend, "his plan of action is one that has been taken up by Dr. Connelly and others at the Hanwell Asylum. I will tell you how Allen acts, for I have been in his house."

"Why," said I, "surely you were never so much out of your mind as to be taken there for a little medical restraint."

"No," he replied, "although at times I have been almost fit to be one of his patients. I went and stayed two or three days in his house as a visitor, and sat at table at meal times with all his patients, ladies and gents: and they were as orderly and well-behaved a company of about thirty as I would wish to meet with; and but for my knowing it was actually a retreat, I should not, from their behavior, have known or suspected anything of the sort. Dr. Allen is a very kind man, and he told me that when any gentleman was first introduced to his house he would take him into his parlor and begin a conversation with him in this manner: 'Sir, you of course have some knowledge of the reasons why your friends place you in my care?' Usually this was received with a silent bow. He would then say: 'You therefore suppose you will be subjected to a straight-jacket and such like restraints. But I see you are a gentleman who, I think, I can trust. Just come with me to the window. You see that avenue of trees and the grass plot?' pointing to a beautiful park in front of the windows. 'Now, instead of the confinement you may have expected, as you are a gentleman of good understanding, I give you liberty to walk in that avenue every day while you are here, the weather permitting, on one condition: That you do not attempt to fly or hide yourself, and you will give me your word of honor, as a gentleman, you will most certainly observe this condition.' 'I observed,' said Dr. Allen, 'my remarks had an extraordinary effect on the patient. His eye would brighten up; he would take my hand and promise very seriously that I might rely upon him, as a man of honor and as one gentleman to another, that he would strictly comply with the condition. I thus gained his confidence, and he had confidence in me: and from that interview,' said the worthy doctor, 'I had seldom any trouble with any of them, and his cure was commenced.'"

"But," I said, "the avenue being among the trees, afforded ample means of escape, if a person was so inclined." 'Not so,' said my friend S. R., 'for Dr. Allen had, at intervals, watchful attendants on each side of the avenue, appearing in dress as gamekeepers or foresters, who thus, without raising suspicion in the minds of those walking there, would prevent any attempt at escape. But he congratulated himself that, except in one or two instances, their aid had never been required since he had adopted this system.'"

It was now getting rather late, and my friend, having finished his lunacy case, I took my departure. But he made me promise to see him again in a few days, for he had a rather long and affecting case to shew me. So, with mutual promise for a further interview, I took my departure.

RAPHAEL'S CARTOONS.

WHEN Her Majesty's gracious pleasure to allow the Cartoons by Raphael to be removed to London from Hampton Court was first made known, it was a happy thought on the part of the Kensington authorities to establish a Raphael Room in the vast Museum under their management. The large gallery formerly occupied, as we have before stated, by the best pictures of the English school, is now devoted exclusively to the actual works of Raphael, or to copies and designs that have emanated directly from his school. The Cartoons, well protected by glass, are now hung at a convenient height from the floor, along both the side walls, so that, in accordance with the original arrangement, they appear face to face. In the Sistine Chapel, however, the scenes relating to St. Peter were placed on the north side of the Presbytery, whilst those connected with St. Paul were reserved for the south. In the present instance it is to be regretted that the same distinction has not been observed.

The large masses of the Cartoons are judiciously relieved by the introduction between them of double pilasters, adorned with excellent copies in full size and brilliant colors of the arabesques which decorate the walls of the celebrated Loggie in the Vatican, whilst the well-known historical scenes of the lunettes, forming what is commonly called "Raphael's Bible," are placed above the string-course so as to serve as an architectural frieze at the point where the curve of the roof first begins. The fine chalk drawing, a legitimate cartoon, on white paper, done by Casanova in 1760, from Raphael's "Transfiguration," finds an appropriate place here, and it is satisfactory to find that its merits have at last been recognized. As far back as the time when the Cartoons were being photographed by Thurston Thompson, the Athenæum pointed out the fine drawing by Casanova, then hidden in the smallest, dingiest of ante-rooms at Hampton Court, as specially worthy of notice and fully deserving to be copied in photography for the use of students.

The remaining wall space at each end of this noble gallery is filled with Raphaelesque objects, such as majolica dishes, in cases, arabesque ornaments, a few specimens of Ugo da Carpi's chiaroscuro prints taken from the cartoons, and a fine piece of Gobelin's Tapestry, representing the Holy Family, in the Louvre, which bears the name of Francis the First. This splendid work of modern art was given to the Department in 1862 by the Emperor of the French, and contrasts strikingly with a very shabby Mortlake tapestry, executed from the "Feed my Sheep" cartoon, hanging very near to it. It is to be regretted that, as a specimen of the ultimate object of these Raphael designs, a more satisfactory example of loom-work was not obtained. "Hangings," wrought after these cartoons, are comparatively numerous in England, although none, of course, could admit of comparison with the original set still in the Vatican, or with the duplicates made expressly for this country, and which, some years ago, we allowed to slip through our fingers, to find an honorable resting place in the Berlin Museum.—Athenæum.

CRUEL MEANS TO A GOOD END.—Torture applied to extort confession, was discontinued, it is said, in the public courts in Portugal, in consequence of the following circumstance: "A conscientious judge, having observed the effect of the rack upon supposed criminals, in making them confess anything to the sacrifice of their lives, to get released from the torture, determined to try an experiment. It is a capital crime, in that country, to kill a horse or mule, and he had one of the former which he much valued. He took care, one night, to have all his servants employed, so that no one but the groom could get into the stable. When all were fast asleep in their beds, he stole thither himself, and cut the horse, so that he bled to death. The groom was apprehended and committed to prison. He pleaded not guilty, but the presumption being strong against him, he was ordered to the rack, where the extremity of the torture soon wrung from him a confession of crime. Upon this confession, he had sentence of hanging passed on him, when his master went to the tribunal and there exposed the fallibility of confessions obtained by such means, by owning the fact himself, and disclosing the motives which had influenced him in making the experiment."—Paris Paper.

CHILDLESS.

FAR out from the pitiless night,
Which enshrouds the gloomy shore,
A fair little bark has sailed o'er the sea,
And my voice—when I call it back to me—
Is drowned in the ocean's roar.

Only a brown little curl
Is left to me, here on the shore,
For the clinging arms and the beautiful eyes,
Soft and blue as the summer skies,
Are gone, forever more.

Only the memory sad
Henceforth will come to my soul,
Of the dear little feet that have wandered away,
And eyes that have sought the Perfect Day,
Beyond where the dark waves roll.

And I look with longing eyes,
Far away, o'er the midnight sea,
To catch the gleam of a snowy sail;
But tears and longings will not avail—
He will never come back to me.

INGLE.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"WE that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

ELECTION day is generally a very quiet day in San Francisco, and the one just passed was no exception to the rule. Half our citizens didn't take the trouble to vote at all, and yet, though they don't set much value upon a vote when they have it, can pity the poor, wretched, miserable English workingman who is actually starving for what free and independent American citizens possessing it care little about. It's just the same with votes as with peaches. The English workingman reads of peaches which he can seldom hope to taste, as they cost from 2 to 5 cents apiece when in season, and $5 apiece when out of season, being eaten by hogs in America. "Oh," cries the workingman with a craving for wall-fruit, "I'd live on peaches if I were in America." He is mistaken, he would care little for peaches if they were as plentiful as potatoes. It was exactly the same feeling which made the English laborer howl so lustily for his rights at the late general election; he hadn't got a vote and he wanted one just as the little boy cried for the moon because it was out of his reach. A very large proportion of the people of England who have votes never vote, just as in San Francisco where every one has a vote, many neglected this duty. What a pity it is that we have not an unenfranchised class who, by their agonizing wailings over the misery of being without a vote might teach those who possess the article the true value of it. Votes are a dreadfully cheap, common commodity at a State election. Something ought really to be done to bull the vote market.

VESTVALI thinks she's quite a man,
When dressing—forth to sally—
Instead of crying, "Quick! my cloak!"—
Like us, cries "My vest! valet!"

MATCH, THE MATCHMAKER.—John T. Match, who was the original inventor of lucifer matches, died recently at Litchfield, Connecticut, aged ninety-seven.—Exchange.

Surely one who has done so much to enlighten the world should have a monument erected to his memory. Let the world, reflecting what matchless misery a return to the light of other days—the old flint and steel—would entail, rear the monument, and we will write the epitaph:

Death has put out the light of life;
Here, with a hasty scratch,
To shine in realms of light above,
See, Death has struck a Match!
A famous man—yet none can say,
(Although great and renowned,)
As of great men 'tis often said,
"His match cannot be found!"
Though dead, he lives—throughout the world
For aye endures his fame,
And children yet unborn will shout
This great inventor's name.
Nay! Match needs no stone column raised
To bid his memory live,
As long as boys cry "matches," all
Him who that light did give.
Unto the world, will, thankful, bless;
And all will say, no doubt,
Who see his tomb—"A first rate Match—
Lived long ere it went out!"

QUITE a painful feeling of anxiety pervaded the musical world of San Francisco when the fact of Signorina Elvira Brambilla's illness became generally known. We are happy to state that there are no fears for her life, and it is quite possible that she may at some future day recover her voice. We do hope she will be careful not to exert herself too soon. The certificate of her medical man, testifying to the existence of "irritation," will, we hope, put a stop to the absurd report that Signorina Brambilla was advised to have a sore throat on the occasion of Signor Fossati's benefit. Another Prima donna, more careful than Brambilla, to prevent the public being disappointed by the non-fulfillment of any promises made in her name, publishes the following:

TO THE PUBLIC.—As my name is made use of by parties in this city, without my consent, and as I am not in good health at present, I wish the public to understand that I do not play for any parties, nor have they any right to use my name without my consent, for benefits or anything else. JULIA MORGAN."

There! That's the way to do it. Why didn't Brambilla come out and say: "I do not play for any parties, nor have they any right to use my name without my consent, for benefits or anything else." "Irritation of the throat" would not interfere with Julia Morgan's appearance on the stage; trouble with her poor feet would be more serious.

A TELEGRAPHIC despatch brings the important intelligence that a call has been issued for a meeting of the holders of Confederate bonds. The bondholders have put their case into the hands of their lawyers with instructions to collect if possible. We are afraid that these bondholders will not be able to collect their little bill. They ought to be aware that the landlord, Uncle Sam, has put an execution in the house of their debtor, and is a preferred creditor. This case can be settled by common law; international law has nothing to do with it. If the bondholders did not remove the goods which belonged to them before the execution was put in, that is their look-out; they have no cause for complaint; they are well aware that, in the case of an execution in a lodging-house, the property of the tenants of rooms is seized as well as the property of the landlord; this is a parallel case; the Confederacy is attached by Uncle Sam, and the cotton belonging to these bondholders which they have neglected to remove, is attached with the rest of the property! They have nothing to complain of; if the Confederacy had been established they would have made a large profit on their investment; the Confederacy failed, and they have lost.

YESTERDAY the Fair was open for the benefit of the "Home of the Inebriate." This institution was about one thousand dollars in debt yesterday morning; it is to be hoped that by the time THE CALIFORNIAN went to press money enough was received to clear off the debt and enable the managers to carry on their good work unhampered. The directors of the Home of the Inebriate modestly refrain from stating the number of perfect cures which they annually discharge; they are afraid of shocking the sober people of San Francisco, we imagine, by letting them know what a number of inebriates there are. If all the patients who have been under treatment at the Home were at the Fair, the building must have been thronged. What a fine sight it would have been to have seen them marching, a sober band of brothers, singing "there's no place like home," meaning, of course, the Home of the Inebriate.

DUTCH FLAT.—"I send you one verse of a song which is very popular here. I hope the Flag and the Gold Hill News will not attribute this to Byron, as they did the little effort sent to "Mark Twain" a few weeks since. If you like the specimen, I can furnish you the remaining fifteen:

"'The wild flowers that blooms in the wild wood
Has at last lost their beautiful leaves,
And the cold chilly winds of mid-somber
Has stole my beloved from me.'

"D. F."

We thought we had made it sufficiently understood that we did not intend to answer any more correspondents; however, we will make an exception in D. F.'s case. We suppose D. F. thinks he is wonderfully smart. We know why he sent that verse to us; he thinks there is a fat feast of grammatical errors for a grammaniac there. We consider it quite as good as many of the popular songs of the day—"Nip-up-de-doo-den-doo," for instance. If D. F. knew the affecting history connected with the rustic ballad which he evidently sneers at, he would be ashamed of his conduct. The young man who wrote those words is a hopeless idiot! Of course you will say "that is evident;" but stay, how did he become an idiot? That young man was once one of the most brilliant contributors to the Flag—in a word, he was "one of the Flag's poets"—his brain softened, day by day, until he at length wrote the ballad, a verse of which you send. We know the other fifteen verses—the author has repeated them to us on some ninety seven or ninety-eight occasions. He claims that "mid-somber" is perfectly justifiable by poetical licence, being an abbreviation of "mid-December." Poor fellow!

WEDNESDAY last was a day to be noted in the literary annals of San Francisco. The Alta's Poets' Corner was again re-opened! Weeping poets had in vain brought their sacrifices and laid them at the gate; all in vain—it was sternly closed. To A. R., of Santa Barbara, belongs the credit of unclosing those classic portals. The Peri found the charm to unlock the gates of Paradise in a mortal's tear. A. R., of Santa Barbara, softened dear old grandmama Alta's heart with a deceased infant. Far be it from us to criticize the lines "To a Friend, on the death of an Infant," but we should indeed be remiss if we allowed such an event as the reopening of the "Poets' Corner" to pass without comment. We cannot regret that infant. No! We would be content that a whole hecatomb of infants should be sacrificed to restore to the world the blessing of a "Poets' Corner" in the Alta. We cannot refrain from quoting just two lines from A. R., sweet little thing—we won't criticize; we've said we wouldn't, and we'll stick to it:

"'Tis true that the earth his loved relics doth claim,
And from it engender'd their being first came;"

There! It's all like that. We implore the Alta, having made such a beginning, to keep it up. Let not these little gems be, as they have now, alas! been for so long, as angels' visits but each morning let one of them appear as a bright oasis in the commercial desert on the fourth page. Relent! oh stern Roman matron, relent! Once more fold the children of song to thy breast—on the fourth page.

GOTTSCHALK will this evening perform a new piece of music of his own composition, entitled "Her Eyes." Now how can he make a piano express "her eyes?" We shall not know whether her eyes are black or brown, hazel, gray, or green. If it is a dedication, then we would like to know to whose eyes it is dedicated, and why the pianist didn't dedicate it to her ears instead. The report that Mr. Gottschalk's next piece of music is to be entitled "That Nose," is, we believe, entirely destitute of foundation.

WE should have liked to have seen the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle while he was reading that little paragraph in last week's "Mouse-Trap." He is evidently subjugated; he knows that "Parturiunt montes; nascetur ridiculus mus" is to be found in Horace now. He could find no case for his eyes in that paragraph in which he accused the Mouse trap of putting e's for i's. He has since endeavored to heap coals of fire upon our head, by constantly paying neat little compliments to "Trem" in the Chronicle. It won't do; we don't feel sorry for what we have done, and are as ready as ever to have a mus with the classical editor.

"EXTENSIVE FORGERY SCHEMES NIPPED IN THE BUD." This is the heading of a paragraph in an evening paper; it goes on to give an account of the affair, which entirely contradicts the heading. It appears that the scheme was "blown" by one of the parties concerned in it; it could not, therefore, have been "nipped in the bud."

WE elected Chase. We know Chase was a good man in the Washington Market, and hence he would be a good man for the Legislature. Men who scorned to put their votes in the market gave them to the market-keeper. We knew when we wrote that "stately march of numbers," which far surpassed the ballad of "Chevy Chase," that it would do the business.

TREM

MY WONDERFUL ADVENTURES IN SKITZLAND.

CHAPTER I.

THE BEGINNING IS A BORE—I FALL INTO MISFORTUNE.

I AM fond of gardening. I like to dig. If among the operations of the garden any need for such a work can be at any time discovered or invented, I like to dig a hole. On the 3d of March, 1849, I began a hole behind the kitchen wall, whereinto it was originally intended to transplant a plum-tree. The exercise was so much to my taste, that a strange humor impelled me to dig on. A fascination held me to the task. I neglected my business. I disappeared from the earth's surface. A boy who worked a basket by means of a rope and pulley, aided me; so aided, I confined my whole attention to spade labor. The centripetal force seemed to have made me its especial victim. I dug on until autumn. In the beginning of November I observed that, upon percussion, the sound given by the floor of my pit was resonant. I did not intermit my labor, urged as I was by a mysterious instinct downwards. On applying my ear, I occasionally heard a subdued sort of rattle, which caused me to form a theory that the centre of the earth might be composed of mucus. In November, the ground broke beneath me into a hollow, and I fell a considerable distance. I alighted on the box-seat of a four-horse coach, which happened to be running at that time immediately underneath. The coachman took no notice whatever of my sudden arrival by his side. He was so completely muffled up, that I could observe only the skilful way in which he manipulated reins and whip. The horses were yellow. I had seen no more than this, when the guard's horn blew, and presently we pulled up at an inn. A waiter came out, and appeared to collect four bags from the passengers inside the coach. He then came round to me.

"Dine here, sir?"

"Yes, certainly," said I. I like to dine—not the sole point of resemblance between myself and the great Johnson.

"Trouble you for your stomach, sir."

While the waiter was looking up with a polite stare into my puzzled face, my neighbor, the coachman, put one hand within his outer coat, as if to feel for money in his waistcoat-pocket. Directly afterwards his fingers came again to light, and pulled forth an enormous sack. Notwithstanding that it was abnormally enlarged, I knew by observation of its form and texture that this was a stomach, with the œsophagus attached. This, then, the waiter caught as it was thrown down to him, and hung it carelessly over his arm, together with the four smaller bags (which I now knew to be also stomachs) collected from the passengers within the coach. I started up, and as I happened to look round, observed a skeleton face upon the shoulders of a gentleman who sat immediately behind my back. My own features were noticed at the same time by the guard, who now came forward, touching his hat.

"Beg your pardon, sir, but you've been and done it."

"Done what?"

"Why, sir, you should have booked your place, and not come up in this clandestine way. However, you've been and done it!"

"My good man, what have I done?"

"Why, sir, the Baron Terro's eyes had the box-seat, and I strongly suspect you've been and sat upon them."

I looked involuntarily to see whether I had been sitting upon anything except the simple cushion. Truly enough, there was an eye, which I had crushed and flattened.

"Only one," I said.

"Worse for you, and better for him. The other eye had time to escape, and it will know you again, that's certain. Well, it's no business of mine. Of course you've no appetite now for dinner? Better pay your fare, sir. To the Green Hippopotamus and Spectacles, where we put up, it's ten-and-six."

"Is there room inside?" I enquired. It was advisable to shrink from observation.

"Yes, sir. The inside passengers are mostly skeleton. There's room for three, sir,. Inside, one-pound-one."

I paid the money, and became an inside passenger.

CHAPTER II.

OF DIVISIONS WHICH OCCUR IN SKITZLAND—I AM TAKEN UP.

PROFESSOR ESSIG'S Lectures on Anatomy had so fortified me, that I did not shrink from entering the Skitzton coach. It contained living limbs, loose or attached to skeletons in other respects bare, except that they were clothed with broadcloth garments, cut after the English fashion. One passenger only had a complete face of flesh, he had also one living hand; the other hand I guessed was bony, because it was concealed in a glove obviously padded. By observing the fit of his clothes, I came to a conclusion that this gentleman was stuffed throughout; that all his limbs, except the head and hand, were artificial. Two pairs of Legs, in woollen stockings, and a pair of Ears, were in a corner of the coach, and in another corner there were nineteen or twenty Scalps.

I thought it well to look astonished at nothing; and, having pointed in a careless manner to the scalps, asked what might be their destination? The person with the Face and Hand replied to me; and although evidently himself a gentleman, he addressed me with a tone of unconcealed respect.

"They are going to Skitzton, sir, to the hair-dresser's."

"Yes, to be sure," I said. "They are to make Natural Skin Wigs. I might have known."

"I beg your pardon, sir. There is a ball to-morrow night at Culmsey. But the gentry do not like to employ village barbers, and therefore many of the better class of people send their hair to Sitzton, and receive it back by the return coach properly cut and curled."

"Oh," said I. "Ah! Oh, indeed!"

"Dinners, gentlemen!" said a voice at the window, and the waiter handed in four stomachs, now tolerably well filled. Each passenger received his property, and pulling open his chest with as much composure as if he were buttoning his waistcoat, restored his stomach, with a dinner in it, to the right position. Then the reckonings were paid, and the coach started.

I thought of my garden, and much wished that somebody could throw Professor Essig down the hole that I had dug. A few things were to be met with in Skitzland which would rather puzzle him. They puzzled me; but I took refuge in silence, and so fortified, protected my ignorance from an exposure.

"You are going to Court, sir, I presume?" said my Face and Hand friend, after a short pause. His was the only passenger able to enter into conversation.

"My dear sir," I replied, let me be frank with you. I have arrived here unexpectedly out of another world. Of the manners and customs, nay, of the very nature of the people who inhabit this country, I know nothing. For any information you can give me, I shall be very grateful."

My friend smiled incredulity, and said:

"Whatever you are pleased to profess, I will believe. What you are pleased to feign a wish for, I am proud to furnish. In Skitzland, the inhabitants, until they come of age, retain that illustrous appearance which you have been so fortunate as never to have lost. During the night of his twenty-first birthday, each Skitzlander loses the limbs which up to that period have received from no care, no education. Of those neglected parts the skeletons alone remain, but all those organs which he has employed sufficiently continue unimpaired. I, for examle, devoted to the study of the law, forgot all occupation but to think, to use my senses and to write. I rarely used my legs, and therefore Nature has deprived me of them."

"But," I observed, "it seems that in Skitzland you are able to take yourselves to pieces."

"No one has that power, sir, more largely than yourself. What organs we have we can detach on any service. When dispersed, a simple force of Nature directs all corresponding members whither to fly that they may reassemble."

"If they can fly," I asked, "why are they sent in coaches? There were a pair of eyes on the box seat."

"Simply for safety against accidents. Eyes flying along are likely to be seized by birds, and incur many dangers. They are sent, therefore, usually under protection, like any other valuable parcel."

"Do many accidents occur?"

"Very few. For mutual protection, and also because a single member is often all that has been left existing of a fellow Skitzlander; our laws, as you, sir, know much better than myself, estimate the destruction of any part absent on duty from its skeleton as a crime equivalent to murder—"

After this I held my tongue. Presently my friend again enquired whether I was going up to Court?

"Why should I go to Court?"

"Oh, sir, it pleases you to be facetious. You must be aware that any Skitzlander who has been left by Nature in possession of every limb, sits in the Assembly of the Perfect, or the Upper House, and receives many state emoluments and dignities."

"Are there many members of that Upper Assembly?"

"Sir, there were forty-two. But if you are now travelling to claim your seat, the number will be raised to forty-three."

"The Baron Terroro—" I hinted.

"My brother, sir. His eyes are on the box seat under my care. Undoubtedly he is a Member of the Upper House."

I was now anxious to get out of the coach as soon as possible. My wish was fulfilled after the next pause. One Eye, followed by six Pairs of Arms, with strong hard Hands belonging to them, flew in at the window. I was collared; the door was opened, and all hands were at work to drag me out and away. The twelve Hands whisked me through the air, while the one Eye sailed before us, like an old bird, leader of the flight.

CHAPTER III.

MY IMPRISONMENT AND TRIAL FOR MURDER.

What sort of sky have they in Skitzland? Our earth overarches them, and, as the sunlight filters through, it causes a subdued illumination with very pure rays. Skitzland is situated nearly in the centre of our globe; it hangs there like a shrunken kernel in the middle of a nutshell. The height from Skitzland to the over-arching canopy is great; so great, that if I had not fallen personally from above the firmament, I should have considered it to be a blue sky similar to ours. At night it is quite dark; but during the day there is an appearance in the heaven of white spots; their glistening reminded me of stars. I noticed them as I was being conveyed to prison by the strong arms of justice, for it was by a detachment of members from the Skitzton Police that I was now hurried along. The air was very warm, and corroborated the common observation of an increase of heat as you get into the pith of our planet. The theory of Central Fire, however, is, you perceive, quite overturned by my experience.

We alighted near the outskirts of a large and busy town. Through its streets I was dragged publicly, much stared at, and much staring. The street life was one busy nightmare of disjointed limbs. Professor Essig, could he have been dragged through Skitzton, would have delivered his farewell lecture upon his return. 'Gentlemen, Fuit Ilium—Fuit Ischium—Fuit Sacrum—Anatomy has lost her seat among the sciences. My occupation 's gone.' Professor Owen's Book 'On the Nature of Limbs,' must contain, in the next edition, an Appendix 'Upon Limbs in Skitzland.' I was dragged through the streets, and all that I saw there, in the present age of little faith, I dare not tell you. I was dragged through the streets to prison and there duly chained, after having been subjected to the scrutiny of about fifty couples of eyes drawn up in a line within the prison door. I was chained in a dark cell, a cell so dark that I could very faintly perceive the figure of some being who was my companion. Whether this individual had ears wherewith to hear, and mouth wherewith to answer me, I could not see, but at a venture I addressed him. My thirst for information was unconquerable; I began, therefore, immediately with a question:

"Friend, what are those stars which we see shining in the sky at mid-day?"

An awful groan being an unsatisfactory reply, I asked again.

"Man, do not mock at misery. You will yourself be one of them."

'The Teachers shall shine like stars in the Firmament.' I have a propensity for teaching, but was puzzled to discover how I could give so practical an illustration of the text of Fichte.

"Believe me," I said, "I am strangely ignorant. Explain yourself."

He answered with a hollow voice:

"Murderers are shot up out of mortars into the sky, and stick there. Those white, glistening specks, they are their skeletons."

Justice is prompt in Skitzland. I was tried incredibly fast by a jury of twelve men who had absolutely heads. The judges had nothing but brain, mouth and ear. Three powerful tongues defended me, but as they were not suffered to talk nonsense, they had little to say. The whole case was too clear to be talked into cloudiness. Baron Terroro, in person, deposed, that he had sent his eyes to see a friend at Culmsey, and that they were returning on the Skitzton coach, when I, illegally, came with my whole bulk upon the box-seat, which he occupied. That one of his eyes was, in that manner, totally destroyed, but that the other eye, having escaped, identified me, and brought to his brain intelligence of the calamity which had befallen. He deposed further, that having received this information, he despatched his unwashed eye with arms from the police-office, and accompanied with several members of the detective force, to capture the offender, and to procure the full proofs of my crime. A sub-inspector of Skitzton Police then deposed that he sent three of his faculties, with his mouth, eye, and ear, to meet the coach. That the driver, consisting only of a stomach and hands, had been unable to observe what passed. That the guard, on the contrary, had taxed me with my deed, that he had seen me rise from my seat upon the murdered eye, and that he had heard me make confession of my guilt. The guard was brought next into court, and told his tale. Then I was called upon for my defence. If a man wearing a cloth coat and trousers, and talking excellent English, were to plead at the Old Bailey that he had broken into some citizen's premises accidentally by falling from the moon, his tale would be received in London as mine was in Skitzton. I was severely reprimanded for my levity, and ordered to be silent. The Judge summed up and the Jury found me Guilty. The Judge, who had put on the black cap before the verdict was pronounced, held out no hope of mercy, and straightway sentenced me to Death, according to the laws and usage of the Realm.

CHAPTER IV.

THE LAST HOURS OF THE CONDEMNED IN SKITZLAND — I AM EXECUTED.

The period which intervenes between the sentence and execution of a criminal in Skitzland is not longer than three hours. In order to increase the terror of death by contrast, the condemned man is suffered to taste at the table of life from which he is banished, the most luscious viands. All the attainable enjoyment that his wit can ask for, he is allowed to have, during the three hours before he is shot, like rubbish, off the fields of Skitzland.

Under guard, of course, I was now to be led whithersoever I desired.

Several churches were open. They never are all shut in Skitzton. I was taken into one. A man with heart and life was preaching. People with hearts were in some pews; people with brains, in others: people with ears only, in some. In a neighboring church, there was a popular preacher, a skeleton with life. His congregation was a crowd of ears, and nothing more.

There was a day-performance at the Opera. I went to that. Five lungs and mouths possessed the stage, and afterwards there was a great bewilderment with legs. I was surprised to notice that many of the most beautiful ladies were carried in and out, and lifted about like dolls. My guides sneered at my pretence of ignorance, when I asked why this was. But they were bound to please me in all practicable ways, so they informed me, although somewhat pettishly. It seems that in Skitzland, ladies who possess and have cultivated only their good looks, lose, at the age of twenty-one, all other endowments. So they become literally dolls, but dolls of a superior kind; for they can not only open and shut their eyes, but also sigh; wag slowly with their heads, and sometimes take a pocket-handkerchief out of a bag, and drop it. But as their limbs are powerless, they have to be lifted and dragged about after the fashion that excited my astonishment.

I said then, "Let me see the Poor." They took me to a Workhouse. The men, there, were all yellow; and they wore a dress which looked as though it were composed of asphalte; it had also a smell like that of pitch. I asked for explanation of these things.

A Superintendent of Police remarked that I was losing opportunities of real enjoyment for the idle purpose of persisting in my fable of having dropped down from the sky. However, I compelled him to explain to me what was the reason of these things. The information I obtained, was briefly this: that Nature, in Skitzland, never removes the stomach. Every man has to feed himself; and the necessity for finding food, joined to the necessity for buying clothes, is a mainspring whereby the whole clockwork of civilized life is kept in motion. Now, if a man positively cannot feed and clothe himself, he becomes a pauper. He then goes to the Workhouse, where he has his stomach filled with a cement. That stopping lasts a life-time, and he thereafter needs no food. His body, however, becomes yellow by the superfluity of bile. The yellow-boy, which is the Skitzland epithet for pauper, is at the same time provided with a suit of clothes. The clothes are of a material so tough that they can be worn unrepaired for more than eighty years. The pauper is now freed from care, but were he in this state cast loose upon society, since he has not that stimulus to labor which excites industry in other men, he would become an element of danger in the state. Nature no longer compelling him to work, the law compels him. The remainder of his life is forfeit to the uses of his country. He labors at the workhouse, costing nothing more than the expense of lodging, after the first inconsiderable outlay for cement wherewith to plug his stomach, and for the one suit of apparel.

When we came out of the workhouse, all the bells in the town were tolling. The Superintendent told me that I had sadly frittered away time, for I had now no more than half an hour to live. Upon that I leaned my back against a post, and asked him to prepare me for my part in the impending ceremony by giving me a little information on the subject of executions.

I found that it was usual for a man to be executed with great ceremony upon the spot whereon his crime had been committed. That in case of rebellions or tumults in the provinces, when large numbers were not unfrequently condemned to death, the sentence of the law was carried out in the chief towns of the disturbed districts. That large numbers of people were thus sometimes discharged from a single market-place, and that the repeated strokes appeared to shake, or crack, or pierce in some degree that portion of the sky towards which the artillery had been directed. I here at once saw that I had discovered the true cause of earthquakes and volcanoes; and this shows how great light may be thrown upon theories concerning the hidden constitution of this earth, by going more deeply into the matter of it than had been done by any one before I dug my hole. Our volcanoes, it is now proved, are situated over the market-places of various provincial towns in Skitzland. When a revolution happens, the rebels are shot up,—discharged from mortars by means of an explosive material evidently far more powerful than our gun-powder or gun-cotton; and they are pulverized by friction in grinding their way through the earth. How simple and easy truth appears, when we have once arrived at it.

The sound of muffled drums approached us, and a long procession turned the corner of a street. I was placed in the middle of it,—Baron Terroro by my side. All then began to float so rapidly away, that I was nearly left alone, when forty arms came back and collared me. It was considered to be a proof of my refractory disposition, that I would make no use of my innate power of flight. I was therefore dragged in this procession swiftly through the air, drums playing, fifes lamenting.

We alighted on the spot where I had fallen, and the hole through which I had come I saw above me. It was very small, but the light from above shining more vividly through it, made it look, with its rough edges, like a crumpled moon. A quantity of some explosive liquid was poured into a large mortar, which had been erected (under the eye of Baron Terroro) exactly where my misfortune happened. I was then thrust in, the Baron ramming me down, and pounding with a long stock or pestle upon my head in a noticeably vicious manner. The Baron then cried "Fire!" and as I shot out, in the midst of a blaze, I saw him looking upward.

CHAPTER V.

MY REVENGE ON THE SKITZLANDERS.

By great good fortune, they had planted their artillery so well, that I was fired up through my hole again, and alighted in my own garden, just a little singed. My first thought was to run to an adjoining bed of vegetable marrows. Thirty vegetable marrows and two pumpkins I rained down to astonish the Skitzlanders, and I fervently hope that one of them may have knocked out the remaining eye of my vindictive enemy, the Baron. I then went into the pantry, and obtained a basket full of eggs, and having rained these down upon the Skitzlanders, I left them.

It was after breakfast when I went down to Skitzland, and I came back while the dinner bell was ringing.

DEATH BY LIGHTNING.

THE time required for a rifle-bullet to pass clean through a man's head may be roughly estimated at one thousandth of a second. Here, therefore, we should have no room for sensation, and death would be painless. But there are other actions which far transcend in rapidity that of the rifle-bullet. A flash of lightning cleaves a cloud, appearing and disappearing in less than one-hundred-thousandth of a second, and the velocity of electricity is such as would carry it over a distance equal to that which separates the earth and moon in a single second. It is well known that a luminous impression once made upon the retina endures for about one-sixth of a second, and that this is the reason why we see a ribbon of light when a glowing coal is caused to pass rapidly through the air. A body illuminated by an instantaneous flash continues to be seen for the sixth of a second after the flash has become extinct; and if the body thus illuminated be in motion, it appears at rest at the place which it occupied when the flash fell upon it. The color-top is familiar to most of us. By this instrument a disc with differently colored sectors is caused to rotate rapidly; the colors blend together, and if they are chosen in the proportions necessary to form white light, the disc appears white when the motion is sufficiently rapid. Such a top, rotating in a dark room, and illuminated by an electric spark, appears motionless, each distinct color being clearly seen. Professor Dove has found that a flash of lightning produces the same effect. During the thunder storm he put a color-top in exceedingly rapid motion, and found that every flash revealed the top as a motionless object with colors distinct. If illuminated solely by a flash of lightning, the motion of all bodies on the earth's surface would, as Dove has remarked, appear suspended. A cannon ball, for example, would have its flight apparently arrested, and would seem to hang motionless in space as long as the luminous impression which revealed the ball remained upon the eye.

If, then, a rifle-bullet move with sufficient rapidity to destroy life without the interposition of sensation, much more is a flash of lightning competent to produce this effect. Accordingly, we have well authenticated cases of people being struck senseless by lightning who, on recovery, had no memory of pain. The following circumstantial case is described by Hemmer: On the 30th of June, 1788, a soldier in the neighborhood of Mannheim, being overtaken by rain, placed himself under a tree, beneath which a woman had previously taken shelter. He looked upwards to see whether the branches were thick enough to afford the required protection, and, in doing so, was struck by lightning, and fell senseless to the earth. The woman at his side experienced the shock in her foot, but was not struck down. Some hours afterwards the man revived, but knew nothing about what had occurred, save the fact of his looking up at the branches. This was his last act of consciousness, and he passed from the conscious to the unconscious condition without pain. The visible marks of a lightning stroke are usually insignificant: the hair is sometimes burnt; slight wounds are observed; while, in some instances, a red streak marks the track of the discharge over the skin.

The effects of a shock of artificial lightning on a gentleman of our acquaintance, who is very sensitive to the electric discharge, may be here described. Under ordinary circumstances, the discharge from a small Leyden jar is exceedingly unpleasant to him. Some time ago he happened to stand in the presence of a numerous audience, with a battery of fifteen large Leyden jars charged beside him. Through some awkwardness on his part, he touched a wire which he had no right to touch, and the discharge of the battery went through his body. Here life was absolutely blotted out for a very sensible interval, without a trace of pain. In a second or two consciousness returned; the recipient of the shock saw himself in the presence of his audience and apparatus, and, by the help of these external facts, immediately concluded that he had received the battery discharge. His intellectual consciousness of his position was restored with exceeding rapidity, but not so his optical consciousness. To prevent the audience from being alarmed, he observed that it had often been his desire to receive accidentally such a shock, and that his wish had at length been fulfilled. But while making this remark, the appearance which his body presented to him was that of a number of separate pieces. The arms, for example, were detached from the trunk, and seemed suspended in the air. In fact, memory, and the power of reasoning, appeared to be complete long before the optic nerve was restored to healthy action. But what we wish chiefly to dwell upon here is, the absolute painlessness of the shock: and there cannot be a doubt, to a person struck dead by lightning, the passage from life to death occurs without consciousness being in the least degree implicated. It is an abrupt stoppage of sensation, unaccompanied by a pang.—Reader.

THE SERPENT.

I HAD doffed coat and hat, so as to diminish the surface exposed to the thorns and brambles, and looking around me from a square yard of terra firma, I found myself the spectator of a loathsome, yet fascinating scene. Three or four yards from me was the nest, beneath which, in long festoons rested a huge black snake; a bird, two-thirds grown, was slowly disappearing between his expanded jaws. As they seemed unconscious of my presence, I quietly observed the proceedings. By slow degrees he compassed the bird about with his elastic mouth; his head flattened, his neck writhed and swelled, and two or three undulating movements of his glistening body finished the work. Then, with marvellous ease, he cautiously raised himself up, his tongue flaming from his mouth the while, curved over the nest, and, with wavy, subtle motions, explored the interior. I can conceive of nothing more overpoweringly terrible to an unsuspecting family of birds than the sudden appearance above their domicile of the head and neck of this arch-enemy. It is enough to petrify the blood in their veins. Not finding the object of his search, he came streaming down from the nest to a lower limb, and commenced extending his researches in other directions, sliding stealthily through the branches, bent on capturing one of the parent birds. That a legless, wingless creature should move with such ease and rapidity where only birds and squirrels are considered at home, lifting himself up, letting himself down, running out on the yielding boughs, and traversing with marvellous celerity the whole length and breadth of the thicket, was truly surprising. One thinks of the great myth, of the Tempter and the "cause of all our woe," and wonders if the Arch One is not now playing off some of his pranks before him. Whether we call it snake or devil matters little. I could but admire his terrible beauty, however, his black, shining folds, his easy, gliding movement, head erect, eyes glistening, tongue playing like subtle flame, and the invisible means of his almost winged locomotion. The parent birds, in the meanwhile, kept up the most agonizing cry—at times fluttering furiously about their pursuer, and actually laying hold of his tail with their beaks and claws. On being thus attacked, the snake would suddenly double upon himself and follow his own body back, thus executing a strategic movement that at first seemed to paralyze his victim and place her within his grasp. Not quite, however. Before his jaws could close on the coveted prize, the bird would tear herself away, and, apparently faint and sobbing, retire to a higher branch. His reputed powers of fascination availed him little, though it is possible that a more timid and less combative bird might have been held by the fatal spell. Presently, as he came gliding down the slender body of a leaning alder, his attention was attracted by a slight movement of my arm; eyeing me an instant, with that crouching, utter motionless gaze which I believe only snakes and devils can assume, he turned quickly- a feat which necessitated something like crawling over his own body—and glided off through the branches, evidently recognizing in me a representative of the ancient parties he once so cunningly ruined. A few moments after, as he lay, carelessly disposed in the top of a rank alder, trying to look as much like a crooked branch as his supple, shining form would admit, the old vengeance overtook him. I exercised my prerogative, and a well-directed missile in the shape of a stone brought him looping and writhing to the ground. After I had completed his downfall, and quiet had been partially restored, a half-fledged member of the bereaved household came out from his hiding-place, and, jumping upon a decayed branch, chirped vigorously, no doubt in celebration of the victory. What the emotions of the parent birds were on seeing their destroyer's head so thoroughly bruised, and a part of their little ones at least spared to them, I can only conjecture; but I imagined the news spread immediately, and that my praises as the deliverer were sung in that neighborhood ever after.—Atlantic Monthly.

PLEASANT GAMES FOR CALIFORNIA CHILDREN.

Hunt the Chinaman.—This is a very pretty game, and may be played by any number of boys and girls. First, procure a Chinaman. This can easily be done, but the best way is to lie in wait for one on the corner of the street. Commence your game by pelting him with decayed oranges, which you may gradually exchange for pieces of coal, and eventually wind up with brick-bats. If he is particularly inoffensive, some diversion may be made by the smallest boys climbing up his back by the aid of his pigtail. Do not scruple to cut off his tail if you can; he values it highly, and the expression of his countenance under this infliction, together with his unintelligible protestations, is very amusing. Sometimes a dog may be set on him—but you should be careful to have the beast well in training, or he will take all the sport to himself. Should the Chinaman show fight, a clever boy will appeal to his parents, and not scruple to say he was attacked first, at which his father, if a believer in "superior races," will instantly join the sport. It is always safest, however, for young beginners to commence with Chinamen carrying bundles, as they afford much more entertainment in their endeavors to escape with their property. This game is peculiarly a city sport, and is in a measure protected by the police, who always interfere to shield any boy from an infuriated Chinaman.

Coasting Down Hill.—How bountiful is Nature! She gives us a variously diversified surface, with valleys and hills. The hills serve for a variety of purposes. Those in the city are chiefly used by little boys to ride down on their wagons. Rincon Hill, Bush, and California streets, are capital for that purpose. Drag your wagon to the top of the hill, place yourself fairly upon it, and descend. If the sidewalk is crowded with people, the fun will be greater. A clever boy will frighten one-half into the gutter, and upset the other half. Some boys have been known to alarm ladies into hysterics, and break old gentlemen's legs, but it is wisest for young beginners to avoid anything but simple fractures at first. Great amusement may be found in crossing the street, as foot passengers, crossing in another direction, will be totally unprepared for the encounter.

Ringing Door-Bells.—This play is essentially an out-door game, and requires some dexterity on the part of the player. Proceed boldly to the front door of any dwelling and ring the bell briskly. Retire rapidly to the corner of the street and watch the expression of the person who opens the door. Repeat the process immediately, but never a third time. A clever variation of this sport may be obtained by carefully watching the out-goings and in-comings of the master of the house. When you perceive him coming up the street, calculate your time so as to give two false alarms before he reaches the doorstep. The moment that he touches the bell, he will probably be vigorously assaulted with a broom by the chambermaid, or have a bucketful of hot water thrown over him from the area. At which retire.

An Experiment in Optics.—This is a scientific game, which may be played with advantage by school boys. Apply your fist rapidly, and with some force, against the eye of a confederate, without previously acquainting him of your intention. Then retire hastily. In a few hours afterward, you will observe a slight swelling around his eyelid, pleasantly relieved by a variety of beautiful colors. This, your teacher will tell you, is ecchymosis, produced by the presence of extravasated blood in the aerolar tissue, which you may explain to your confederate.

Evening Sports.—If you live on a frequented street, and your residence be distant from the lamp post, a fine entertainment may be afforded by affixing one end of a stout cord to the bell pull of your house, and the other end to the bell pull of the dwelling opposite, allowing the cord to stretch across the sidewalk at about the height of a pedestrian's ankles. If properly arranged, this cord will trip up the first passer-by, and ring the two door bells simultaneously. An altercation will probably ensue between your parent, the pedestrian, and the opposite resident, in which it is inadvisable to join. Retire hastily.

Selling the Waterman.—Follow a water cart, with a confederate. While he engages the attention of the driver, briskly turn the faucet so as to allow the contents of the cart to escape into the street. If your confederate keeps up an animated conversation with the driver, the water will probably escape entirely before he discovers it. This is a somewhat dangerous and difficult pastime. As its principal charm is the discomfited expression of the waterman on finding his cask empty, to be near enough to thoroughly enjoy it places you in a dangerous proximity to his whip.

To Sell a Vegetable Man.—This may be done in the same way as the foregoing, by removing the tail board of the cart. It has also another advantage, as you can pelt the driver with his own stock. Besides, potatoes look very droll when tumbling out of a cart. Wode.

POPULAR FALLACIES.—No. 3.

"Let's talk of graves, of worms, and epitaphs."
Richard II., iii., 2d.

THE worm is probably the lowest order of the animal creation, and it has always been a favorite comparison with those who love to expatiate on the littleness and meanness of humanity to liken man to a worm of the dust. Not only so, but much rhetoric has been expended to show the inferiority of man in certain respects to his earth-born companions, and to enthrone the annelida over the bimana. The worm is represented as making man his prey at last; as triumphing over his proud rival, and revelling within the lobes of the brain like conquering Cortez in the halls of the Montezumas.

It is a common belief that it is the fate of the body, after death, to be devoured by worms; and we retain a vivid impression of a funeral sermon we once listened to, by a pious bishop, who improved the occasion and comforted the mourners by dwelling upon all the accessories of the charnel-house, and particularly by a vivid description of the worms crawling in and out of the eye-sockets.

We have even heard people in grave and serious mood speculating upon the origin of these

"Cold consumers of their clay,"

some contending that they were native earth-worms, others that they were developed after death from germs pre-existing in the body—a remarkable instance of ingenuity so often displayed in accounting for a fact prior to any evidence of or enquiry concerning its existence. If we trace the history of this widely-received notion we shall find it comes, like so many other fallacies and heresies, from a literal interpretation of a bold Oriental figure, or from an enlarged application of that figure, never intended by the original writers.

Man comes to the grave, and his bodily abasement in the earliest times naturally suggested humiliating reflections. The unknown author of the book of Job says, chapter xxiv., 14: "I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister."

The same author, speaking of the death of the wicked, says, "The worm shall feed sweetly on him," xxiv., 20; and again, in chapter xix., 26, "And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Now, although the word worms, in this passage, is not in the original, and the translators might as well have supplied he or death, yet, making the most of it, according to our version, it does not assert any general fact as to the fate of the body, but only makes a certain event independent of a possible contingency.

We remember an able exposition of this text by an old sermonizer, who divided it into three heads, thus: "Firstly, the skin worms; secondly, what they done; and thirdly, what become of the man after the skin worms had eaten him up." But we will remind the reader, for his comfort and consolation, that earth-worms are not carnivorous, but subsist on decaying vegetable matter, roots, vegetable moulds, etc.; that no animal life of any kind can exist excluded from air, and at the depth of ordinary inhumation.

Gehenna, or the Valley of Hinnon, a narrow ravine at the south of Jerusalem, it is well known, was the great cloaca, or cess pool, into which was emptied, not only the sewerage of the city, but where the dead bodies of criminals and the carcasses of animals were cast, and where fires were kept constantly burning. To the Jewish imagination, this furnished a striking symbol of retribution and infamy. Hebrew poets freely used the figure in denunciation of the wicked. The expression used in the last verse of the book of Isaiah, "For their worm shall not die, nor their fire be quenched," cited more than once in the New Testament, is a figure evidently deduced from the same source, and in connection with a few kindred expressions in the Sacred Scriptures, has, doubtless, been the fruitful seed of that wide-spread belief to which we have referred.

It is somewhat remarkable to what an extent this has passed into literature, and been adopted by poets and moralists—doubtless, in many instances, as a simple metaphor or poetic exaggeration—till it has finally come to be literally believed and cherished almost as an article of faith by multitudes of people.

We will cite only a few instances out of hundreds which could be accumulated. Sir Thomas Brown, in Urn Burial, speaks of the Epicurean worm, which will only feed on human flesh.

Shakspeare, in As You Like It, IV., i., says:

"Men have died, and worms have eaten them,
But not for love."

Or,

"Tombs do worms unfold."—Merchant of Venice, II., i.

"The worm that hath eat of a king."—Hamlet, IV., iii.

Byron freely uses the same image, two instances of which we will cite. In that "Sketch" wherein he portrays the character of the woman who was active in bringing about the alienation between himself and wife, and which contains perhaps the severest denunciation of anything in the English language. He says:

"Down to the dust, and as thou rottest away, E'en worms shall perish on thy poisonous clay;"

and again, in describing remorse:

"It is as if the dead could feel
The icy worm around them steal,
Without the power to drive away
The cold consumer of their clay."

Dr. Watts improved the occasion in the well-known strain:

"Thy flesh, perhaps thy greatest care,
Shall crawling worms consume:
But ah! destruction stops not there,
Sin kills beyond the tomb."

Carlyle, satirizing a do-nothing aristocracy, speaks of them as fattening for the worm.

Thus have poets and preachers made the worm an inseparable adjunct of the grave and the tomb. And yet, after all, there is not a word of truth in it. The body, when decently buried or when deposited in a tomb, is entirely safe from any predaceous annelida. What St. Paul calls the temple of the Holy Spirit is not subject to such profanation. Only in exceptional cases, as when bodies are exposed in warm seasons in the open air, insects, who do not discriminate between man and beast, deposit their ova in the carcass, and the larvæ feed sweetly upon it. Incremation and interment are designed as much as anything to prevent such a fate. No one dying in his bed and among human beings, need apprehend any such dissection of his mortal remains.

After all, it matters little what disposition is made of our mortal remains—of the body we are so prone to call ourselves, but which is only a cast-off garment we have picked up by the way. The vaults of St. Denis could not guard the ashes of the kings of France. Tombs, though their walls be forty feet in thickness, like that of Cecilia Metella, at Rome; pyramids like that of Cheops, cannot imprison the subtle elements which compose alike the frames of Pharaohs and of beggars. Earth, and air, and water, reclaim and repossess their own. A traveller falls in the desert, or in mountain solitudes, or in lonely forests. The sun kisses him, and he is sublimed. The soft winds steal to his resting-place. They shrink not from his touch; they caress his wan brow and faded cheek; they play about the parted lips, and lift the tangled meshes of his hair. So they woo him to their embraces; they bear him away on their wings till he is buried in air. The earthly residuum of this burned-out human torch—the handful of phosphate of lime, which formed the bony frame-work of his earthly tenement—goes "to mix forever with the elements."

We have only a life lease of our house of clay. Others occupied it before us: others will use it after us. By the endless transmutations of Nature's great labratory, the particles of our frame are wrought over into grass, and grain, and animal fibre, and again into human flesh and sinews.

"The dust we tread upon was once alive."

Aye! and it will live again.

The red man sleeps with his fathers, but his revivified limbs still stalk the streets of cities built beside the burial-place of his tribe. The nerve that once drew the bow now wields the pen or brandishes the sword. Blood-drenched Waterloo becomes a prolific wheat field, and the tide of life, which ebbed slowly and sadly away as night came down on the plain, now courses joyously through the veins of another generation. Truly has it been said, "Death is the Lucina of life, and the inexhaustible nutriment of existence is decay."

As Saturn devours his offspring, so we eat our ancestors. The lot of Mausolus, so loved and lamented by his wife, Artemisia, that she took his incinerated remains in morning powders, till his body had found a resting place in a living sepulchre, is by no means a solitary case. Could we have the history of the atoms which form even the less honored portions of our frame, some of them may have once obeyed a monarch's will or fed a maiden's pride.

The materials of which our life-garment is woven are gathered from every clime. China and Japan, Ceylon and Sumatra, the islands of the sea, and the sea itself, give us their choicest productions. The all-embracing air comes to us laden with odors and exhalations from distant shores, which we inspire and assimilate. If God had not originally made of one blood, all nations that dwell on the face of the earth, they would soon become so by the unceasing interchange of elementary particles.

Sir Thomas Brown says (we quote from memory:) "We are all what we so much abhor, anthropophagi and man-eaters; for this goodly frame, which surrounds our being, once lay upon our trenchers and came in by our mouths: in brief, we have devoured ourselves."

Shakspeare, in that exquisite passage in Hamlet, which discovers, perhaps as forcibly as any other, the rare delicacy of a fancy at the same time so marvelously vigorous, says of "Ophelia:"

"Lay her i' the earth;
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets spring!"

This is the true transmigration, to live again in tree, or flower, or bird, or insect, pursuing that long series of changes, which, for aught we know to the contrary, may be infinite, and which render probable, if not positive, the immortality of matter as well as of spirit. Libra

NEW BOOKS.

THE following works, notices of which were crowded out last week, were received from A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street:

Mildred Arkell. By Mrs. Henry Wood. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Bros.

A novel by Mrs. Wood is pretty sure of a cordial welcome from a large class of readers. Mildred Arkell is in the author's characteristic and interesting style, but in sensation qualities—and Mrs. Wood's reputation is mainly based upon these—it is somewhat inferior to her other productions. Except a constructive homicide committed on one schoolboy by another, the story is quite barren of criminal incident, and lamentably deficient in supernatural appearances.

Human Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene. With illustrations. By T. S. Lambert, M. D. New York: William Wood & Co.

A class-book of human anatomy and physiology admirably systematized and illustrated, and particularly adapted to the general student. The explanations are free from technical expressions, except those which are thoroughly and comprehensively defined in the progress of the work.

Illustrated Life, Campaigns, and Services, of General Grant. Philadelphia: Peterson & Bros.

Another one of the illustrated cheap biographies of cotemporary great men; crude, undigested, and unsatisfactory.

A Summer Story, Sheridan's Ride, and Other Poems. By Thomas Buchanan Read. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Mr. Read's new book, a thin but elegantly bound and printed volume, contains the popular "Sheridan's Ride," "A Summer Story," several battle songs, of which "The Piece of Halliard from the Flag of the Cumberland," is noticeable, and a few Roman poems, in composition and melody the best in the volume. We are tempted to make an extract:

ROME ENTERED.

THE loud Vitura rings along the way,
White as the road with dust. The purple day,
O'er Monte Mario, dies from off the dome,
And, lo! the first star leads us into Rome.

Oh, glorious city! Through the deep'ning shade
A thousand heroes, like the gods arrayed,

And bards, with laurel rustling on their hair,
Walk proudly, and speak grandly, till the air
Is full of solemn majesty, and night
Is half way robbed by temples marble white.
Yon tramping steeds, and yonder glittering wheel—
Chariot a Cæsar—while the commonweal
Greets him with pæans, and we proudly march
On toward the Forum. The triumphal arch,
Burning with banners, and the murmuring street,
Deep strewn with roses, till the air is sweet
With floating odors. How the heralds blow
Their wild delirious trumpets, notes that go
Like swift flames soaring with the fiery tune,
Bursting from clarions blazing in the noon!
Whence come we? from what conquest? with what spoil?
Whence are these captives, bleeding as they toil
Under our load of trophies? Whips, and groans,
And blood, that shames the rose-leaves on the stones
For depth of crimson! And the dew of tears
Blistering the noonday dust! O'ercome with years,
And toil, and grief, there drops the way-worn slave
Under the horses; and the conquering wave,
Above his carcass, pours its glorious flood
Down through the Forum in a path of blood,
Roaring with triumph! Do I wake, or sleep?
Thank heaven, 'twas but a dream; a ruined heap
The house of Cæsar and of Nero lies!
And o'er the golden wall the owlet nightly cries.

Carry's Confession. By the author of Mattie—A Stray. New York: Harper & Bros.

AT HOME.—The highest style of being at home grows out of a special state of the affections, rather than of the intellect. Who has not met with individuals, whose faces would be a passport to any society, and whose manners, the unstudied and spontaneous expressions of their inner selves, make them visibly welcome wherever they go, and attract unbounded confidence towards them in whatever they undertake. They are frank, because they have nothing to conceal; affable, because their natures overflow with benevolence; unflurried, because they dread nothing; always at home, because they carry within themselves that which can trust to itself anywhere and everywhere—purity of soul with fulness of health. Such are our best guarantees for feeling at home in all society to which duty takes us, and in every occupation upon which it obliges us to enter. They who live least for themselves are also the least embarrassed by uncertainties.

CHOLERA is making sad havoc in Turkey and Arabia. No less than 48,000 of the pilgrims of Mecca have been swept off, and the streets are filled with corpses. Five thousand of the Persian pilgrims have died, among them a shiek reported to be a saint.

THE Enterprise says things are assuming a more healthy aspect in Virginia City. Fewer signs of "To Let" are visible on dwellings and stores.

LUDICROUS AND ECCENTRIC EPITAPHS.

FROM PETTIGREW'S COLLECTION.

AT Kenning-hill Churchyard in Norfolk, a man of the name of Robert Button is stated to have died on the 29th of June, betwixt 6 and 7 o'clock at night, and the anxiety to record the precise hour of his decease has occasioned them to omit the insertion of the year in which it occurred. It was, however, in 1711.

AT St. Cuthbert, Kildale, Yorkshire:

JOSEPH DUNN.

"HERE lyeth the body of Joseph Dunn, who dyed ye 10th day of March, 1716, aged 82 years. He left to ye poor of Kildale XX s., of Commondale XX s., of Danby XX s., of Westerdale, X. s., to be paid upon his gravestone by equal portions, on ye 1st day of May, and ye 11th of November for ever."

AT Church Creton, Salop:

On a Thursday she was born,
On a Thursday made a bride,
On a Thursday put to bed,
On a Thursday broke her leg, and
On a Thursday died.

AT Hegdon:

Here lyeth the body of WILLIAM STRUTTON, of Padrington,
Buried the 18th of May 1734,
Aged 97.
Who had, by his first wife, twenty-eight children,
And by a second seventeen;
Own father to forty-five,
Grand-father to eighty-six,
Great Grand-father to ninety-seven,
And Great, Great Grand-father to twenty-three;
In all two hundred and fifty-one.

IN Winchester Cathedral Churchyard:

THOMAS FLETCHER, a Grenadier in the North Hants Militia, died May 12, 1764, aged 26 years.

Here sleeps in peace a Hampshire Grenadier
Who caught his death by drinking cold small beer;
Soldiers be wise from his untimely fall,
And when you 're hot, drink strong or not at all.

IN Wolverhampton Church, ob. 1690:

Here lie the bones
Of Joseph Jones,
Who eat whilst he was able;
But once o'er fed,
He dropt down dead,
And fell beneath the table.
When from the tomb,
To meet his doom,
He rises amidst sinners:
Since he must dwell
In heav'n or hell,
Take him—which gives best dinners!

JEFF DAVIS.—A Washington dispatch to the Tribune says: "Notwithstanding the various stories set afloat in regard to the ill-treatment of Jeff Davis, it is but just to the authorities to state positively that he is treated with the consideration due a noted prisoner of state by the commandant at Fortress Monroe. No officer has been or is stationed in his cell; he is allowed to take frequent walks upon the ramparts, and is permitted to choose his own food. The story that his cell is guarded by a score or more of bayonets, that in his promenades he is attended by a battalion of soldiers, and that his diet is limited to the army ration, are as ridiculous as they are untrue. The treatment of Jeff Davis is Christian-like and humane and just, such as a generous and dignified Government can well afford to bestow upon one who is no longer its enemy, but its prisoner."

THE New York Tribune, in an article on Mr. Wendell Phillips, says: "But for his misfortune in having received his moral and religious training from a Bible wherefrom the 13th chapter of 1st Coriuthians was unaccountably omitted, he might have taken rank among the very foremost men of our age."

MR. LEACH, of Leach & Cottle's Ferry, who was acting as Judge of Election at that place September 6th, was shot in the groin and dangerously wounded, by a man known as "Banjo John," of Knight's Ferry, who was flourishing a pistol around the polls which went off accidentally.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS.—By the new postal law, the system of free delivery is to be established in every place containing a population of fifty thousand, and at such other places as the Postmaster General, in his judgment, shall direct, provided that the prepayment on drop letters in all places where free delivery is not established shall be one cent only.

THE Marysville Appeal states that Colonel James, the owner of Pilot, will enter him for the grand prizes offered by the State Agricultural Society, and compete with Norfolk and Lodi.

THE MYSTERIES OF IRON.—There is no miracle recorded in the annals of any religion more mysterious, more incomphensible, than some of the well-known properties of the simple metal, iron. Consider, for instance, its change from its ordinary to its passive state. If a piece of the metal in its ordinary condition is immersed in nitric acid, it is powerfully acted upon, entering into a combination with the acid and losing its metallic form. But if a piece of platinum wire has one end inserted in the acid, and the iron is then immersed in contact with the wire, it is so changed that the acid has no power upon it, and this condition continues after the platinum wire is withdrawn. The contact of a single point with the platinum sends a transformation through all of its particles which renders them invulnerable to the attack of the most powerful acid. Even more wonderful is its change under the influence of a current of electricity. When a bar of pure soft iron is welded with an insulated wire and a current of electricity is sent through the wire, the bar is instantly converted into a magnet. It is endowed with an unseen force which stretches out from its ends, and seizing any other pieces of iron within its reach, draws them to itself and holds them in its invisible grasp. The object of insulating the wire is to prevent the electricity from leaving it, and yet through this insulating coat a power is exerted which changes so strangely the nature of the iron, enabling it to act on substances with which it is not in contact. As soon as the circling current ceases, the iron becomes like Samson shorn of his locks, its miraculous power has departed. No less mysterious than either of these is the far more familiar phenomenon of the fall of a piece of iron to the ground, under the simple action of gravitation. What is that invisible force which reaches out in all directions from the earth, and clutches all matter in its grasp? The fibres of this power are imperceptible to any of our senses. If we pass our hands under a suspended rock we can feel nothing reaching from it to the earth, yet there is something stretching up from the earth, taking hold of the rock, and drawing it down with the strength of a hundred cables! We walk enveloped in mysteries, and "our daily life is a miracle."—Scientific American.

NO REFUGE FOR REBELS.—In the hour that sealed the fate of the rebellion, and extinguished its last hope of success, those of the baffled and defeated insurgents who were too implacable for conciliation and too haughty for submission, turned their despairing eyes toward the Empire of Maximilian, as their last refuge on this continent—a refuge where, uniting their fortunes with those of the Emperor, and backed by the power of France, they might still plot mischief and have another opportunity to draw their swords against their country. Animated by such hopes, Gen. David S. Terry, Col. Dan Showalter, Col. Kennedy, Ridgely Greathouse, and multitudes of kindred spirits—many of them accompanied by their families—after a weary pilgrimage, not long since found their way into the province of Sonora. They probably cherished no doubt of meeting with a cordial reception from Maximilian; and knowing that Gwin occupied the high office of Commissioner of the Provinces, these expectations were not unreasonable. But they were doomed to bitter disappointment. Maximilian and his august patron at the Tuilleries were sagacious enough to perceive that no benefit could accrue to them from securing the services of the disbanded rebels great enough to justify the risk of incurring the hostility of the United States—a hostility which any countenance afforded the refugees was well calculated to provoke. Accordingly, Gwin was superseded, and an engagement entered into with our Government to furnish no military employment and no countenance to the Confederate pilgrims. "It is understood," says the Guaymas correspondent of Examiner, "that the Emperor's engagement with the United States will not admit of his accepting the military services these refugees, and I can see no other chance for their employment at the present time in this country." Truly the case of these exiled wanderers is pitiable. They have severed every tie that bound them to their own country, and they will never find a home in any other.—Dramatic Chronicle.

TREES THAT GROW SHIRTS.—"We saw on the slope of Cerra Duida," said M. Humboldt, "shirt trees fifty feet high. The Indians cut off cylindrical pieces two feet in diameter, from which they peel the red and fibrous bark, without making any longitudinal incision. The bark affords them a sort of garment which resembles a sack of a very coarse texture, and without a seam. The upper opening serves for the hands, and two lateral holes are cut to admit the arms. The natives wear these shirts of Marina in the rainy season. They have the form of the ponchos and monos of cotton which are so common in New Grenada, Quito, and in Peru. As in this climate the riches and the benificence of nature are regarded as the primary causes of the indolence of the inhabitants, the missionaries do not fail to say, in showing the shirts of Marina, in the forests of Orinoko, garments are found ready made upon the trees."

C. DEWITT SMITH, Secretary of Idaho Territory, and late Acting Governor, died suddenly at Rocky Bar, on the 19th inst. The Territory is now without a Governor or Secretary.

M'ARONE'S SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY.

IT is a very lucky thing for me that I did not live in the time "when good King Herod ruled this land." I should certainly have been slaughtered with the rest of the Innocents. So simple and humble of heart am I, so forgetful of the ways of this world, that I find myself constantly doing things in a straightforward, direct manner; and even going so far, sometimes, as to tell the truth!

The other day, seized with an uncontrollable desire and yearning to see Aimee Chou-chou, I forgot diplomacy, strategy, and all the rest of my hard-earned worldly knowledge, and set forth, in plain and simple earnest, to find her.

It was a beautiful evening. The sun was slowly wheeling down the yellow harvest-sky; the hedge-row cedar gave forth a spicy fragrance; the crickets and chafers made a quaint dry music in the stubble, and the roadside brook rattled along cheerily over its chequered bed of rippling sand and colored pebbles, dancing on ahead of me as if to show me the way.

I cut myself a stout cane from the hedge, to defend myself from any bears or tigers that I might encounter, and gathered up the miles and threw them behind me right vivaciously. This, however, is an amusement which is productive of fatigue. In time, I wearied, and sat down by the road, upon a tuft of odorous clover, which felt cool and soft, but made my trousers green.

A large brown bug came forth from the thick herbage, and looked at me, wriggling his jointed antennæ the while.

"Bug," said I, "tell me, hast thou seen my love? Thou mayst know her when she walks these fields, in that she is like a light, shining upon the earth. If thou hast seen her, O Bug, I pri'thee guide my steps to her!"

Now in a German story, this respectable scarbeæus would have instantly flown to a secluded bower, in which I should have beheld that dear child, shining away as fairly as ever. Instead of this, however, my brown bug turned his fat, shiny, bulbous back toward me, rather derisively, I thought and went into a cranny under a mullein-weed, still wiggling his feelers, but saying not a word.

A little displeased with the bug, I arose and pursued my way once more.

The country became fresher, cooler, more silent and beautiful, as I got further from the great city; and as dusk began to fall, with a faint gibbous moon rising red behind the tree-trunks, and scented dews dripping from the broad leaves upon the whispering grass beneath, I came to an ancient grange, gray-walled and mossy-roofed, and all surrounded with queer stacks and sheds and granaries, from among which uprose a tall mast, supporting a miniature temple, about whose top wheeled myriads of steel-blue martens, chirping, twittering, and catching no end of pretty gauze-winged flies. Here I halted once more, and going to the oaken door of the long, low, broad-porched kitchen, rapped sharply with my staff.

A comely matron, with red cheeks and a white forehead, and big arms, well dusted with flour, opened the door. This picture of health and rural contentment, with its pleasant background of clean pine shelves, loaded with rows of glittering tins and spotless crockery, attracted me so that I stood silent for some moments, gazing in admiration.

"Well, sir," said the matron at length, "who did you want to see?"

Recalled to myself again, I expressed a desire to procure a meal, if possible, and added a suggestion that I was the proprietor of stamps innumerable, the which I was willing to exchange for solid pabulum.

A frugal banquet of the inexpensive bacon, the nutritious bread, the muscle-creating potato, and limpid water from the tranquil pump, was speedily placed before me, and I sat, thoughtfully eating, and watching, through the open half-door, the restless branches of the feathery locust trees, sinuously waving and tossing in the breezy twilight, like restless and longing hands. When my meal was finished, I tendered the matron a dollar with a back of purest emerald green.

"No sir," said she, with a smile of bountiful generosity: "we don't keep no tarvern, and I'm sure ye're out-'n'-out welcome.

I took a diamond ring from my finger, placed it upon hers, and drawing myself up to my full height, in a manner resembling that of a German prince I once saw, as nearly as I could recall it, said:

"Madame, accept this bauble as a meet reward for your hospitality. And, madame, in future years, when your great-great-grandchildren cluster about your knee while you sit in the chimney-corner as life declines, tell them that your days were not all passed in vain, for that once, on a summer evening of long ago, you enjoyed the boon of seeing the great Chevalier McArone eat!"

With which impressive words I pressed a chaste kiss of gratitude and respect upon her white forehead, and was gone like a beautiful dream.

The moon was casting long bars of silvery light and gray shadow across the greensward when I took the road again. The night-wind still waved and tossed the restless yearning locust boughs, and whispered of love and regret. A few large, slow fire flies wandered hither and thither among the dark foliage, emitting a fitful glow from time to time.

"Foolish insects," I said, after the German style, "why do ye expend your little rays while the lady moon gives light enough for earth? Why do ye not wait till there is no moon, that your beams may be welcome in your brother's eye?"

The fire flies not appearing to comprehend the excellent commercial principles of prudence and economy, went on as before.

"Tell me, ye inconsiderate creatures," I continued; "can ye not light my steps to the abode of the Loveliest of Earth? Show me, O, show me, where is the most beautiful and admirable of human beings!"

At this, a large he fire-fly sailed down, zigzag, and alighted gracefully upon the tip of my nose, where he perched and shone like a carbuncle. It was undoubtedly well meant as a compliment, but my modesty would not permit me to accept of it. I waved the insect off with a perfumed handkerchief, and he betook himself to making love to a female fire-fly of great lustre, who sat on a fence-post winking her light at him.

I was now at the summit of a hill whence I could see, at no great distance, the cheerful ruddy windows of a village. I hastened on, and in a few moments arrived at a hostelry, the landlord of which had a face like a russet apple, all spotted and streaked with wholesome brown and red from much exposure to the sun. Being a little tired of the æsthetic German style by this time, I addressed this landlord in a very plain and American method.

"Good evening, 'Squire; give me a little of your best rye!"

The amber fluid bubbled musically from a long-necked bottle, and went down smoothly, without rasping. I relapsed into the German, and said:

"Da capo!"

"What sir?" asked the landlord.

"Give me another."

"O," said he.

I engaged a chamber in his inn and went forth to stroll around the village. I lingered a moment at the door of the barber's shop, where several Irishmen were getting their teeth shaved. A person sitting inside discharged a quantity of tobacco-juice out into the darkness, and came near drenching me, so I withdrew, and wandered up the broad street, lined with tall elms.

The Justice of the Peace had a fine house, with broad piazzas and a lovely flower-garden and sixteen distinct gables, all different. A soft white-globed lamp hung in the wide open hall, and near a window, the Justice's pretty daughter was practicing her kleine clavierstucke fur anfanger.

I opened the gate, walked up the gravelled path, and entered the parlor, where the little maiden was practicing all alone. She stopped short, and whirled briskly around on the piano-stool when she heard me. I advanced toward her with an intellectual smile, and offered her my hand. She blushed prettily, and hesitated, not knowing what to say.

"My dear," said I, "how do you do? Don't you remember your Cousin, who went away ever so long ago?"

This I hazarded on the general consideration that nearly all young girls have a cousin or two who went away somewhere long ago.

"What!" said the little miss, "not Cousin Tom, who went to California!"

"Yes, dear," I responded, "it is indeed Cousin Tom, come back again! Sit down on my knee, while I tell you all my adventures in foreign lands; how I have rescued dragons and slain princesses, and been seized by pirates, and tatooed; how I have roamed afar, and swam the roaring avalanche, and plucked the ripe porcupine from the tree!"

She looked wonderingly at me, and suffered me to take her soft white hand in mine. We sat down in the deep embrasure of the window, among the vines and plants that made a bower of it, and I told her extraordinary stories of hap and mishap by flood and field. In turn, she told me that Ma had gone out to make a call, and Pa had gone off on business. She also suggested refreshments, and I not refusing, set forth some cake and raspberries and sherry in a cosy breakfast-room adjoining. While rendering justice to these gifts, I heard merry and stentorian voices on the piazza, and directly the Justice roared out to my fair entertainer:

"Here, Milly, come in here! Where are you? I've brought home your Cousin Tom, all the way from California!"

And in truth there entered with him, to the parlor, a broad-shouldered bush-bearded young fellow with a haversack and leggings.

Milly stared at me.

"It is a mistake," I whispered, and kissing her . . . for her mother . . . I popped out of the breakfast-room window, scuttled off to the village inn, and was snug in bed in two minutes.

In my slumbers that night, I dreamed I was still travelling in search of Aimée Chou-chou; that I still saw the fire-flies, and interrogated the bugs. And I dreamed that the bugs were crawling over me, and woke up and found it was true.

TURKISH WOMEN.

THE Turkish women have now willingly adopted European amusements and fashions. Operas and balls please them far better than the solitary life to which they were formerly condemned. In Europe, however, there are also serious employments for the female sex, which render the wife the husband's assistant. The Oriental wife will not listen to anything of this sort, and believes she has fulfilled her duty when she annually presents society with a child, which she does not suckle herself. If a young Greek, Armenian, or Levantine girl is educated in a convent, she learns to read and write a little; if she remains at home, she learns to speak French from her European governess. She gets on fastest in those things in which she receives no instruction, and will look out of the window for half the day, or practice positions before the mirror. The mother dreams away three-fourths of her time on the sofa, and leaves her children, who are always numerous, to the care of the servants. The lesson she incessantly repeats to her daughter is to look out for a husband. As there are far more girls than young men, the latter are treated by the ladies with that attention which, in Europe, falls to the share of the fairer sex. The richest toilette, the most provocative desire to please are employed, and even scandal is not shunned, if it compromise a man; the end justifies the means. Love-letters, rendezvous, secret betrothals, in case of need even an elopement, followed by the paternal blessing—all is permitted, but no mesalliance. In this land, where there is no nobility—no aristocracy of the mind or of wealth—a Castilian arrogance prevails. Everybody is vain of his personal position, so that a cloth-dealer would never give his daughter to a tailor, or a carpenter marry a shoemaker's daughter.

When the daughter has visited the theatres long enough, and shown herself sufficiently at the promenades, followed, at some distance, by her mother, and her object of marrying has been gained, she asks for a rich equipment, not in clothes and linen, but in silk dresses, jewelry, and, above all, diamonds. No maid-servant will marry a shoeblack unless he lays, at least, a diamond breast-pin on the altar of love. The most necessary things are neglected, but there is a lavish display of superfluities. When married, the young lady rises at a late hour, spends a good part of the day on the sofa, drinks many cups of coffee, receives visits from time to time, forgets the little she has learned, does not write, read, or work, and leaves all the household duties to her numerous servants, all monetary cares to her husband. The latter goes, at day-break, to Galata, spends his day in the office, at Kaviar Khan, or on 'Change, and goes home late at night. In winter, the couple, whether rich or not, visit the theatre, where they have a box, or, at least, the fourth of a box. On Sunday morning, church and a walk offer an excuse for displaying the richest toilette. The embassy balls, which unite all the fractions of society, are naturally attended. So soon as the first beams of the May sun burst forth, everybody flies and settles down either on the quay of Therapia, or at Biyuk-dereh, and Yeni-Keni, on the shores of the Bosphorus, on the Gulf of Kani-Koi, or under the shady groves of the islands of Kalki and Prinkipo. The town house is entrusted to a poor family, who, in this way, get free lodgings, and a wooden house is hired for six months, generally at a very high price, in which the lady shuts herself up for the whole day. She dreams till evening on her eternal sofa, and then goes out in a dazzling toilette, to refresh herself in a coffee-house on the beach. As regards the husband, he goes every morning, in all weathers, in a kaik or steamer, to Galata. The trip takes two hours, and is either dangerous or uncomfortable. In a kaik you are exposed to be upset by every puff of wind; on the steamer, three to four hundred persons are packed together in the cabins, on deck, and on the paddle-boxes. At night, the husband returns home tired and hungry. Thus people live in summer on the Bosphorus, expensively and uncomfortably. Where the money comes from is an insoluble enigma with many families.

HINDOO FANATICS.—I have seen some who have stood on one leg for years, while others engage the sympathy and exort the charity of many by holding one arm erect overhead until, in time, the flesh withers and the bones set in that position. A few I have met who, firmly clenching one hand, have kept it closed until the nails have grown right through the palm to the other side; and it is well known that many have travelled the whole extent of land, from the Himalays to Cape Comorin, measuring their bodies as they went. Also there is a Chamb Puja, or hook-worship, in which the devotee allows a steel hook to be placed through the muscles of his back, and, in this manner, is suspended from a machine like a wind-mill, to one of the arms to which the victim is attached. On their great feast days, they can be seen thus, whirling round and round, and looking, all the time, as pleased as if they really enjoyed their ride. All this is done with a devotion worthy of a better cause.—Soldiering in Sunshine and Storm.

SOME people think that the beast with ten horns in Revelations is intended to represent the sin of drunkenness.

A TERRIBLE TORNADO.

THE 11th of August, 1831, is a day that will never pass from my memory while I have an existence. My residence at that time was in Bridgetown, on the island of Barbadoes; but the evening preceding I had ridden a few miles into the country, to spend the night at the house of a friend, with whom resided a young lady, a niece, that has since become bound to me by the closest of all earthly ties.

I reached my friend Palmer's house a little after sunset on the evening of the 10th, and found the whole family seated on the piazza, with the addition of a couple of gentlemen, neighbors, who had dropped in for an evening's social call, and one of them, a young and single man, perhaps with a design similar to my own. The servants took charge of my horse and I joined the group. The moment the first cordial family greetings and introductions were over, the weather as usual was brought in, to start a subject of conversation in which everybody could take a part.

"It is very warm," said one.

"Excessively so," said another.

"And not a breath stirring," joined a third.

"And the heavens like a glowing furnace," added a fourth.

"Did you see the sun set to-night, Mr. Grainger?" said Miss Clara Templeton, the young lady I have mentioned, turning to me.

"I did."

"Oh, was it not magnificently beautiful! beyond the pen of poet, or pencil of artist?"

"It was indeed glorious!" I responded, catching some of her enthusiasm.

"I don't like it," said Mr. Grayson, one of the two neighbors alluded to, and who was a plain, blunt man; "these beautiful red sunsets don't bode any good on this island; a storm generally follows; and, if I'm not mistaken, we'll soon have to pay up for all this pretty sky-painting."

"Why, there is no more poetry in your soul than in a column of figures!" cried Miss Templeton, with a gay laugh. "Come, let us have a more cheerful prophecy! Mr. Grainger, are you weatherwise?"

"I fear I am *other*wise," I laughed.

The sunset had certainly been one of the most beautiful I ever saw, and even yet the western sky was all aglow, the soft flush reaching far up toward the zenith and delightfully blending with the blue above. The air was still, almost painfully so, as if Nature were holding her breath in solemn awe; and somehow the mind was led to take on this impression, even to sadness, as I have heard more than one remark since the dire events of that awful night.

A little after nine o'clock, the neighbors visiting at my friend's house took their leave, and presently the family, with the exception of Clara, retired to rest. For some time we remained on the piazza, conversing in low tones, and then withdrew to the parlor, which faced the west, the inner shutters of which were closed. As lovers, then, destined to the nearest and dearest ties of relationship, we had a thousand tender nothings to say, which concerned no one but ourselves, and which would not bear repeating. Time flew by on golden wings, unheeded and unnoted, and an hour or two passed away as so many minutes.

Suddenly we were startled by a favorite cat springing into the room from the one adjoining, mewing as if from fright, and running crouching around the walls, with distended and glaring eyes. At the same time we first became conscious of a strange, sullen roar, and that the wind was already blowing quite fiercely, a matter that we had not before noticed, owing to the pre-occupation of our minds. I looked at Clara, and saw that she was pale with fear.

"Something terrible!" she said, in a nervous whisper.

"Only a storm," I replied, assuming an indifference I did not feel.

She pointed to the cat, and rejoined:

"Unerring instinct often tells the brute creation more than our reason does us. I fear this is only the beginning of a terrible tempest."

As she spoke, and as if in confirmation of her words, a lurid flash was visible through the cracks of the shutters, and was instantly followed by a crash that fairly brought us to our feet.

"Oh, merciful God!" exclaimed Clara, sinking back upon her seat, and covering her eyes with her hands.

"Do not be alarmed, dearest!" said I, tenderly; "it is only a storm such as we often have on the island, and will soon be over."

From this moment the wind rapidly increased in fury; and in the course of an hour the roar of the tempest, commingled with the howlings and shriekings of the wind and crashing of the thunder, had become so great that the human voice could only be distinguished when pitched on its highest key. For some time I had felt very anxious and uneasy, but now I was thoroughly alarmed, and Clara was so frightened as scarcely to be able to speak or move. Furious as the wind already was, it was still increasing, and more than once I felt the house tremble and rock. What the end was to be Heaven only knew!

The air, which during the early part of the night had been oppressively close and warm, had now become disagreeably cold; and seeing Clara shiver, I went and got a shawl from the adjoining room and threw it over her shoulders.

"Do not give way to your fears," I shouted in her ear, the only way I could now make my words distinguishable above the awful roar; "the storm is doubtless at its height and will soon abate."

She grasped my hand nervously, but made no reply. Some time after this my friend, Mr. Palmer, came hurrying into the apartment, his pale face and quivering lips clearly expressing his fears.

"This is terrible!" he exclaimed; "terrible! Already the house rocks, and I fear it will soon be down with a crash, burying us under its ruins!"

He was immediately followed by his wife, leading two children, boys of seven and ten. She tottered to a seat, sank down, and began to cry and wring her hands, the children screaming in terror and clinging to her for protection. Clara now got up, staggered forward, and threw her arms around her neck. The next minute the eldest born, a lad of seventeen, accompanied by his sister, two years younger, rushed into the apartment, and the girl, with a loud cry, immediately ran to her mother, knelt down by her side, and buried her face in her lap. It was a pitiful sight that group of five—four clinging to one, as if to their only hope, in that dreadful hour, and she herself as helpless as an infant!

During the next quarter of an hour, the servants, to the number of ten, all negroes, made their appearance, some crying, and all looking as if they feared their last minute had come. All drew together for sympathy, and all met there, in that time of tribulation, as equals before God. With a horrible death staring all alike in the face, how little is thought of the distinctions of race or color! Who, with a dread eternity opening before him, dare claim superiority over his fellow worms of the dust?

Still the wind increased in fury, and the house trembled and shook in the most frightful manner. Suddenly the western wall came in upon us with a crash, the ceiling came down in fragments, the light was instantly extinguished, the wind swept over and around us with an awful power, and whirled us about among the ruins as a child might have knocked about its toys.

No description can do justice to such a scene, and imagination itself must fall far short of the horrible reality.

For myself, I had been hurled back into one corner, and I found a human body resting heavily upon me. I heard wild shrieks, thought of Clara, and attempted to rise. At that moment a flash of lightning showed me it was a negro who had fallen upon me; and putting my hand to his head, I made the awful discovery that a part of it was gone—having, as I afterwards conjectured, been carried away by a falling beam. The man was dead, and probably never knew what hurt him. As soon as I could, I got out from under him; but the wind blew with such violence that I could not keep my feet, and I was obliged to move about on my hands and knees. I had been considerably bruised, but was not seriously hurt, and I now endeavored to find Clara and render what assistance I could to the living.

The rain was falling in torrents, and against this we had no protection, for the whole house was a mass of ruins. Only by the frequent flashes of lightning could we see anything, for during the intervals the darkness was impenetrable. I succeeded in reaching the group I have mentioned as clinging together, and found Mrs. Palmer, three of her children, and Clara, surrounded by, I may say wedged in among, fragments of timber, but all living, and only injured by bruises no worse than my own. Their escape from instant death, all of them, seemed little less than a miracle. Fearing there might be no safer place for them than where they were, I advised them to remain there for the time; but as Mrs. Palmer was nearly distracted about her husband and son, who had not been seen or heard from since the fall of the building, I continued my explorations among the debris as well as I could, being in constant danger from the shifting fragments, and seeing only by the lightning's glare.

Throughout that long, terrible night, the wind increased in fury till near morning, and it is surprising that any life was preserved. I did not succeed in finding those I sought, but I discovered two more dead bodies of the blacks, and two others seriously wounded, to whom I could render no assistance whatever. I also came upon two others, female servants, who were crouching down together, and did not appear to be injured, but who were so stupefied with fear that I could get no intelligent answer from them.

In attempting to return to Mrs. Palmer and Clara, as I was clambering over a pile of rubbish, the wind suddenly caught me up from the ground, whirled me round and round, carried me a distance of over two hundred yards, and then deposited me as gently upon the earth as I could have put down a child. I was so completely bewildered, though, that for a long time I lay there without making any effort to return to the demolished dwelling; and when I did at length attempt to get back by crawling on my hands and knees, for it was impossible for any human being to stand upright, I lost my way, and remained in the fields till morning.

When daylight came at last, it was only to make visible the horrors of that appalling night. Look where you might, the eye rested upon nothing but the most dire destruction—houses in ruins, trees prostrated, fences swept away, and fields as completely ruined as if a fire had passed over them. In every direction cattle lay dead or dying, dead birds were here and there piled up in heaps, trunks of trees, stakes, and splinters, were everywhere projecting from the earth, into which they had been deeply driven by the force of the wind, and over all that late beautiful island, desolation now reigned supreme.

By this time the fury of the tornado had begun to abate; but the wind still blew so fiercely that, in spite of my utmost exertions, it took me a whole hour to get back to the ruins from which I had been so swiftly removed. There the sight that met my eyes beggars description. Mrs. Palmer, Clara, and the children, were still together where I had left them, but the eldest daughter had been killed by a flying stick of timber striking her on the head, and the others were nearly distracted. Mr. Palmer was found under a pile of rubbish, with a broken leg, and his son lay within a foot of him, with a splinter of a tree, supposed to have been riven by lightning, driven completely through his body. Let me draw a veil over the awful, heart-rending scene, which even now I can only recall with a shudder of horror.

What I have so feebly described as happening at the house of my friend, is only a faint picture of the ruin, destruction, and desolation, which entirely extended over the devoted island. By eight o'clock in the morning the late furious air had become perfectly still, and the bright, hot sun was shining calmly down upon a broad scene of death and woe.

And then, everywhere, throughout the island, it was friend seeking friend, parents their children, children their parents, husbands and wives one another—for, amid the wild fury of the tempest, thousands of persons had become separated—in too many cases, alas! never to meet again in life. All were pale, horrified, despairing, and neighbor could not give his aid and sympathy; trouble had equally come upon himself. Each family, so to speak, had alone to care for its sick and wounded, dig out and bury its dead; and in some cases whole households lay crushed beneath their own ruins for days, and corpses and carcases everywhere sent forth pestilential effluvia, so that many in health sickened and died, while of those seriously wounded scarcely one escaped fever, lock-jaw, and mortification.

Of the eighteen persons, white and black, in the dwelling of my friend on that awful night, nine perished within forty-eight hours, Mr. Palmer himself making one of the fatal number.

Out of a population of one hundred thousand on the island, seventeen hundred lost their lives; and the living, besides all their other horrors, were threatened with famine, for nearly everything in the way of food had been destroyed. Of corn from the fields, however, there were found heaps, where it had been collected by the wind, and this kept off starvation till provisions could be sent from the neighboring islands.

Three months later, the houses everywhere had been rebuilt, new vegetation had taken the place of the old, and the whole island looked as bright and peaceful as before it had been made a land of mourning and a howling waste.

TWO ORATORICAL SPECIMENS.—Speaking extemporaneously is rather difficult until you get used to it. A young lawyer in New Hampshire, who had never yet had a case in court, was invited to deliver an oration on the occasion of the dedication of a new bridge. It was a fine opportunity of establishing his reputation. He did not prepare himself, for he had an idea that that was unlawyer-like, and that a lawyer must be able to speak any number of hours in a style of thrilling eloquence at a moment's notice. He stood out upon the platform, and amid the profound attention of his hearers commenced as follows: "Fellow-citizens: Five-and forty years ago, this bridge, built by your enterprise, was part and parcel of the howling wilderness." He paused for a moment. "Yes, fellow-citizens, only five and-forty years ago, this bridge, where we now stand, was part and parcel of the howling wilderness." Again he paused. [Cries of "Good, go on."] Here was "the rub." "I feel it hardly necessary to repeat, that this bridge, fellow-citizens, only five and-forty years ago, was part and parcel of the howling wilderness; and I will conclude by saying, that I wish to God it was part and parcel of it now!"

Another orator we have heard of, in appealing to the "bone and sinew," said: "My friends, I am proud to see around me to-night the hardy yeomanry of the land, for I love the agricultural interests of the country; and well may I love them, fellow-citizens, for I was born a farmer—the happiest days of my youth were spent in the peaceful avocations of the son of the soil. If I may be allowed to use a figurative expression, my friends, I may say I was raised between two rows of corn." "A pumpkin, by thunder!" exclaimed an inebriated chap just in front of the stage.

BELLE BOYD IN CAMP AND PRISON.*

AT the risk of being pronounced by the Examiner a villifier of the Sunny South, we venture to assert that Rebel Literature is not of a peculiarly high order. Indeed, literature seems to be a weed unsuited to the saered soil of Dixie, and ill-adapted to its perfume-laden air. We had hoped that the long-promised book of Miss Belle Boyd would make some amends for Pollard's stilted history and Semmes' dreary diary, but we are again disappointed. So far as we can see, nothing is left but to fall back upon "Waddell," who may yet be induced to narrate some of his thrilling adventures. Nevertheless, the book before us is altogether an ambitious one. It is not the production of Miss Boyd, single-handed and alone, as the title indicates, but the brilliant achievement of herself, her husband, and that great man, George Augusta Sala.

The contribution of Mr. Hardinge, at once lieutenant and husband, embraces the last seven chapters of the volume, being one-third of the whole. It is mainly made up of his diary, which forcibly reminds one of the "Journal of the Retired Citizen" in the Spectator, as a few extracts will show:

"January 3d and 4th—Wrote to my friends outside * * was introduced to Captain M., brother of General M., the distinguished Kentucky cavalry officer, and we became very warm friends afterwards.

"January 5th—I attempted my first cup of tea this morning. Gods! fancy my turning cook! My friends laughed heartily at my handiwork.

"January 6th—Saw an account in the paper of my friend Mrs. Colonel ——— having been sent South. Thank God, she is free.

"January 9th and 10th—Damp weather. Affected with the 'blues.' My feet swollen so that I cannot put my boots on.

"January —th. Two letters. Very gloomy, and dull, and cold."

We are not aware whether these last words refer to the two letters, the weather, or to the Lieutenant himself, but very gloomy, and dull, etc., aptly express our idea of his part of the performance. It is therefore scarcely worth while to waste words on Lieutenant Hardinge. He is an opaque body, at best, shining—if at all—by borrowed light. As Newell is known as the spouse of Ada Isaacs Menken, Hardinge is celebrated as the husband of Belle Boyd.

That portion written by the lady is not above criticism. There is a certain brassy, flashy tone about the whole of it scarcely compatible with good taste. It would be unpleasant enough to fall upon such phrases as "high-toned," "giving in," "skedaddling," etc., even in a vile Yankee production, but to find them embalmed in the pages of a "daughter of the Douglass blood"—which Miss Boyd is good enough to inform us is the fact in regard to herself—is truly distressing. An inordinate indulgence in the most hackneyed quotation, with a constant use of such school-girl exclamation as "Alas! Methought," etc., seem to be the most striking peculiarities of her feeble style. Not but that our authoress can be energetic and nervous enough in expression, when occasion demands it. There is no end to "Stanton's minions," brutal Yankees," "hateful Yankee doodle," "hellish shouts of Northern soldiery," etc. We should indicate chapter nine as that wherein she is most shrill, discoursing somewhat wildly upon the "Bastile," the "Tower of London," "Autocrat of Russia," "Siberian chains," and the "clanking" thereof. That, however, which has more amused us is the exceedingly lofty idea the writer entertains of herself and of her work. We are haunted with the suspicion that she has made the most of Belle Boyd. She is constantly telling us "the celebrated Belle Boyd" did this, or "the famous Belle Boyd" did that. She informs us, at tedious length, how she was named the "Virginia heroine." How wondering crowds used to gaze on her, "coming a long distance to catch sight of the Rebel Spy," and how, wherever she went, she was received and considered as "a distinguished personage." Then, too, there is her mysterious air, "I might if I could," or "If I should," etc., by which we are made to understand that Miss Boyd is possessed of information, which, if she once reveal, there will be an end of the United States. But we are darkly told "the time is not yet." It is unfortunate that, in addition to all this, there is a certain Miss D. living in our midst who has done wonderful things already, and may do more. Miss Boyd does not dare disclose the name of this individual, though doubting not but that "she will recognize her own portrait," which, drawn by the writer, presents "a lovely, fragile-looking girl of nineteen, with long black hair, remarkable for the sweetness of her temper and the gentleness of her disposition." Considering what an intrepid woman this unknown Miss D. is, we take comfort, notwithstanding her hair and disposition, in the thought that she is fragile!

It is quite refreshing to turn from so much threatening on the one hand, so much lamentation on the other, and read of that which never fails to interest: the love of two young, innocent, and pure beings. In the following gushing language Miss Boyd tells her story:

"It was the second evening after our surrender that Captain H., Mr. Hardinge, and myself, were seated together close by the wheel. The moon shone beautifully clear, lighting up everything with a brightness truly magnificent; the ocean, just agitated by a slight breeze that swept over its surface, looked like one vast bed of sparkling diamonds, and the rippling of the little waves, as they struck the vessel's side, seemed but a soft accompaniment to the vocal music with which Captain H. had been regaling us.

> Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
> Creep in our ears; soft stillness, and the night,
> Become the touches of sweet harmony.

Presently Captain H. went forward on the bridge and conversed with Mr. Hall, the officer on watch. We two were left to ourselves; and Mr. Hardinge quoted some beautiful passages from Byron and Shakspeare.

Then, in a decidedly "Claude Melnotte" style, he endeavored to paint the "home to which, if love could but fulfil its prayers, this heart would lead thee!" and from poetry he passed on to plead an old told tale."

Of course we can do no justice to this, and much like this, in the book, it being wholly beyond our range.

The Introduction, of some fifty pages, claims for a moment our attention. We are made to know at the outset that it is written "by a friend of the South," and this "friend" is no less a man than the George Augusta Sala aforesaid. It is doubtless astonishing to George Augusta that, he being the friend of the South, it should have failed in its contest with the North. With "Augusta" for you, who can be against you? Indeed, "Sala" does not think the South has failed; at least but for a time. All is not lost—Sala says so. Hear the words of the Prophet: "Though lost for a moment in clouds and darkness, prophetic Hope, the last solace of the unfortunate, still waits and watches for its [the Southern flag's] appearance as the harbinger of Southern liberty and independence." Whatever faults the South may have committed, we think she deserved a better fate than to be patronized by Sala; and however much we may dislike Miss Belle Boyd, we are not prepared to wish her so much ill as to have for her "friend" the author of "The Seven Sons of Mammon." Of all the cheap reputations, his is about the cheapest. He is capable of writing at length of broiled quail, and describing well the interior of a third-rate gambling house. Beyond that he has never succeeded in literature. We think it was the Saturday Review that lately described him as "as ignorant, and vain as ignorant." To listen to this poor hack discoursing on "the sovereignty of the States and the absolute political and moral right of secession," is exquisitely ludicrous. We suppose Sala calls such vulgar, tawdry stuff as this pathetic. Speaking of Miss Boyd's being without money in England, he writes: "Cut off from all pecuniary resources at home, she has to had part with her jewelry piece by piece, including her wedding presents, to pay her weekly bills. We can well understand how trouble like that would smite the heart of a high-toned woman, the daughter of affluence and luxury, even more cruelly than the tortures of a Federal prison." We can well understand how payment of his "weekly bills" smites the heart of the "high-toned" Sala; but why should he thus stigmatize Miss Belle Boyd?

Mr. Sala takes great umbrage at Miss Boyd's not being permitted, in the night, when in prison, to sing the song called "Maryland," and styled by him "The Marseillaise of the South." We do not know whether Miss Boyd is a "gifted songstress" or not, but, were she a very nightingale, it would not be unreasonable to hush a lay in which lines like these are found:

> "I see the blush upon thy cheek,
> Maryland!
> And thou wert ever bravely meek,
> Maryland!
> But lo! there surges forth a shriek
> From hill to hill, from creek to creek."

Or:

> "I hear the distant thunder hum,
> Maryland!
> The old lines, bugle, fife, and drum,
> Maryland!
> She is not dead, nor deaf, nor dumb,
> Hurrah! she spurns the Northern scum," etc.

We could afford to pass "Northern scum," but "surging shriek" and "humming thunder" ought to be suppressed. And this may be the reason why the song is not permitted to be sung in the streets of London, which Mr. Sala himself informs us is the fact, though at a loss to account for this procedure on the part of the English Government. Mr. Sala, however, seems to think with us, that he alone cannot successfully introduce La Belle Rebelle to the Public. But the man of capacity is found. "The accomplished author of Guy Livingstone" turns the crank. Sala is but the forerunner of the accomplished "Guy." The former, indeed, baptizes with water, but the latter baptizes with fire. Having himself seen Miss Boyd in prison at Washington, he writes in the following musky style, which quite overpowers us:

"No need to ask what her crime had been; aid and abetment of the South suggested itself before you detected the ensign of the South that the démoiselle still wore undauntedly—a pearl solitaire fashioned as a single star. * * One evening I chanced to be loitering almost under the window. A low significant cough made me look up; I saw the flash of a gold bracelet and the wave of a white hand; and there fell at my feet a fragrant, pearly rosebud, nestling in fresh green leaves. My thanks were perforce confined to a gesture and a dozen hurried words; but I would the prison beauty could believe that fair Jane Beanfort's rose was not more prized than hers, though the first was a love-token to a king, the last only a graceful gift to an unlucky stranger. I suppose that most men, whose past is not utterly barren of romance, keep some withered flowers till they have lived memory down; and I pretend not to be wiser than my fellows. Other fragrant messengers followed in their season; but if ever I 'win hame to my ain countrie,' I make mine avow to enshrine that first rosebud in my reliquaire with all honor and solemnity, there to abide till one of us shall be dust."

We confess to not being deeply affected with this idea of the obsequies of the "Rose-bud," notwithstanding the impressive suggestion that the same will be performed "with all honor and solemnity." Nor do the awful words in which the 'avow' is made convey to our mind any definite meaning. Considering the frailty of rose-buds generally, we should say, one would quickly "turn to dust," even if carefully interred in a reliquaire.

To show the animus of the writer of this work, it will be sufficient to remark that in the introduction, "the unprincipled demagogue," Andrew Johnson, is charged with the murder of Abraham Lincoln. "It is usual, in cases of murder, to look for the criminal among those who expect to be benefitted by the crime. In the death of Lincoln, his immediate successor in office alone receives the benefit of his dying." So writes Sala. But the gravity of the charge is lost in the weakness of the accuser.

We would fain part in perfect good nature with our authoress, for hencelorth, if we mistake not, we shall see her no more. The 'Confederacy' is already a thing of the past. A few of its names may live for a time, in view of the real greatness of those who bore them. The rest, though performing some deeds of valor, though suffering some real privations, must quickly fade from the memories of men. Success might have rewarded Miss Boyd with a foot-note in History, but failure exacts the penalty of neglect and obscurity. Nor will we be foolishly wroth with England, for the sake of Sala and those after his kind, if we but remember the Mills, the Brights, the Goldwin Smiths, who are at once the firm friends of the American People and the master minds of their own.

PIONEER'S CELEBRATION.—The Pioneers celebrate the anniversary of the admission of California into the Union by an oration, poem, and banquet to-day. The Rev. Horatio Stebbins is to deliver the oration; James F. Bowman, Esq., the poem. These selections speak well for the character of the literary exercises.

THE following are the names of the successful candidates for the Legislature, in this city: For the Senate—A. L. Tubbs, Union; W. J. Shaw, Democrat. Short term, Edward Nunan, Democrat. For Assembymen—Charles Clayton, David Dwyer, James Bowman, Charles L. Wiggin, Henry Dutton, and S. C. Bugbee, elected by the Unions and Independents; and J. A. McClelland, M. A. Braly, Michael Hawkins, George Hearst, Samuel L. Lupton, and E. J. Chase, Democrats.

THE jury in the case of Thomas Byrne, charged with the murder of C. T. Hill in San Souci Valley, were out less than half an hour, when they returned a verdict of murder in the first degree. Byrne was least affected of any man in the Court. Turning to his brother, who was in tears, he burst out into a mocking laugh, and on being taken back to jail, he said he did not care a d—n, and avowed his intention of meeting death like a hero.

ON the grounds of the new State Capitol, says the Sacramento Bee, merry is the music from dozens of hammers in the hands of crafty stone-cutters. Huge blocks of excellent granite are being brought into shape—loads of brick pass up by means of tall ladders, and the stupendous work is making fair and reliable progress.

NN.

BEING A NOVEL IN THE FRENCH PARAGRAPHIC STYLE.

BY THE CALIFORNIAN'S CONDENSED NOVELIST.

—Mademoiselle, I swear to you that I love you!

—You who read these pages. You who turn your burning eyes upon these words—words that I trace—Ah, Heaven! the thought maddens me.

—I will be calm. I will imitate the reserve of the festive Englishman, who wears a spotted handkerchief which he calls a Belchior, who eats biftek, and caresses a bull-dog. I will subdue myself like him.

—Ha! Poto-beer! All right—Goddam!

—Or, I will conduct myself as the free-born American—the gay Brother Jonathan! I will whittle me a stick. I will whistle to myself "Yankee Doodle," and forget my passion in excessive expectoration.

—Hoho!—wake snakes and walk chalks.

The world is divided into two great divisions: Paris and the provinces. There is but one Paris. There are several provinces, among which may be numbered England, America, Russia, and Italy.

NN was a Parisian.

But NN. did not live in Paris. Drop a Parisian in the provinces, and you drop a part of Paris with him. Drop him in Senegambia, and in three days he will give you an omelette souffle or a paté de foi gras, served by the neatest of Senegambian filles, whom he will call Mademoiselle. In three weeks he will give you an opera.

NN. was not dropped in Senegambia, but in San Franciso—quite as awkward.

They find gold in San Francisco, but they don't understand gilding.

NN. existed three years in this place. He became bald on the top of his head, as all Parisians do. Look down from your box at the Opera Comique, Mademoiselle, and count the bald crowns of the fast young men in the pit. Ah—you tremble! They show where the arrows of Love have struck and glanced off.

NN. was also near-sighted, as all Parisians finally become. This is a gallant provision of Nature to spare them the mortification of observing that their lady friends grow old. After a certain age every woman is handsome to a Parisian.

One day, NN. was walking down Washington street. Suddenly he stopped.

He was standing before the door of a mantua-maker. Beside the counter, at the further extremity of the shop, stood a young and elegantly formed woman. Her face was turned from NN. He entered. With a plausible excuse, and seeming indifference, he gracefully opened conversation with the mantua-maker as only a Parisian can. But he had to deal with a Parisian. His attempts to view the features of the fair stranger by the counter were deftly combatted by the shop woman. He was obliged to retire.

NN. went home and lost his appetite. He was haunted by the elegant basque and graceful shoulders of the fair unknown, during the whole night.

The next day he sauntered by the mantua-maker's. Ah, Heavens! A thrill ran through his frame, and his fingers tingled with a delicious electricity. The fair inconnu was there! He raised his hat gracefully. He was not certain, but he thought that a slight motion of her faultless bonnet betrayed recognition. He would have wildly darted into the shop, but just then the figure of the mantua-maker appeared in the doorway.

—Did Monsieur wish anything?

Misfortune! Desperation. NN. purchased a bottle of Prussic acid, a sack of charcoal, and a quire of pink note paper, and returned home. He wrote a letter of farewell to the closely fitting basque, and opened the bottle of Prussic acid.

Some one knocked at his door. It was a Chinaman, with his weekly linen.

These Chinese are docile, but not intelligent. They are ingenious, but not creative. They are cunning in expedients, but deficient in tact. In love they are simply barbarous. They purchase their wives openly, and not constructively by attorney. By offering small sums for their sweethearts, they degrade the value of the sex.

Nevertheless, NN felt he was saved. He explained all to the faithful Mongolian, and exhibited the letter he had written. He implored him to deliver it.

The Mongolian assented. The race are not cleanly or sweet savored, but NN. fell upon his neck. He embraced him with one hand, and closed his nostrils with the other. Through him, he felt he clasped the close-fitting basque.

The next day was one of agony and suspense. Evening came, but no Mercy. NN. lit the charcoal. But, to compose his nerves, he closed his door and first walked mildly up and down Montgomery street. When he returned, he found the faithful Mongolian on the steps.

—All lity!

These Chinese are not accurate in their pronunciation. They avoid the r, like the English nobleman.

NN. gasped for breath. He leaned heavily against the Chinaman.

—Then, you have seen her, Ching Loug?

—Yes. All lity. She cum. Top side of house.

The docile barbarian pointed up the stairs, and chuckled.

—She here—impossible! Ah, Heaven! do I dream?

—Yes. All lity—top side of house. Good by, John.

This is the familiar parting epithet of the Mougolian. It is equivalent to our au revoir.

NN. gazed with a stupefied air on the departing servant. He placed his hand on his throbbing heart. She here—alone beneath this roof. Oh, Heavens—what happiness!

But how? Torn from her home. Ruthlessly dragged, perhaps, from her evening devotions, by the hands of a relentless barbarian. Could she forgive him?

He dashed frantically up the stairs. He opened the door. She was standing beside his couch with averted face.

A strange giddiness overtook him. He sank upon his knees at the threshold.

—Pardon, pardon. My angel, can you forgive me?

A terrible nausea now seemed added to the fearful giddiness. His utterance grew thick and sluggish.

—Speak, speak, enchantress. Forgiveness is all I ask. My Love, my Life!

She did not answer. He staggered to his feet. As he rose, his eyes fell on the pan of burning charcoal. A terrible suspicion flashed across his mind. This giddiness—this nausea. The ignorance of the barbarian. This silence. O merciful heavens! she was dying!

He crawled toward her. He touched her. She fell forward with a lifeless sound upon the floor. He uttered a piercing shriek, and threw himself beside her.

* * * * * * *

A file of gendarmes, accompanied by the Chef Burke, found him the next morning lying lifeless upon the floor. They laughed brutally—these cruel minions of the law—and disengaged his arm from the waist of the wooden dummy which they had come to reclaim for the mantua-maker.

Emptying a few bucketfuls of water over his form, they finally succeeded in robbing him, not only of his mistress, but of that Death he had coveted without her.

Ah! we live in a strange world, Messieurs.

THEATRICAL TALK.

THE stock company returned from their travels, and opened at Maguire's Opera House on Monday, in the comedy of Money. Mrs. Sophie Edwin won golden opinions from the citizens of Sacramento and Marysville, and the press of those cities cordially endorsed her as an admirable actress. On Wednesday evening, Lady Audley's Secret was played. Mr. Pauncefort found a part especially adapted to him in "Robert Audley," and played it extremely well. East Lynne followed, how good Mrs. Sophie Edwin is in the character of "Lady Isabel" afterwards "Madame Vine," is a matter of history. This afternoon the popular play Waiting for a Verdict will be performed. The performance this evening is for the benefit of Mr. J. E. Taylor, when a host of volunteers will appear; the farces of Tom and Jerry and His Last Legs will be performed.

The public is greedy for a sensation and one is promised them. Mlle. Felicita de Vestvali, surnamed "the magnificent," makes her first appearance at Maguire's Opera House on Monday evening in a grand melo-dramatic, scenic play entitled Romanio, the Beautiful Demon. I most willingly endorse Vestvali as "magnificent," and give the following reasons for the faith that is in me. She is magnificently handsome, has a magnificent figure and stage presence, and a magnificent deep contralto voice, a voice which combines the strength and depth of the masculine vocal organ with the rich sweetness characteristic of the feminine. Vestvali possesses the flow of animal spirits so necessary to the actress who essays to act the man. Vestvali "the magnificent" will achieve a magnificent success; I found this opinion upon observation of her style during the rehearsal of Romanio, the Beautiful Demon. This play will be produced with fine scenic effects, and several fine choruses have been introduced. In anticipation of the rush which will take place on Monday night, the entrance to the Opera House has been enlarged; to obtain standing room on that night an early attendance will be imperatively necessary.

The Scottish drama of Jennie Deans was produced at Wheatleigh's Eureka on Monday. It was well put upon the stage, and strongly cast. Mr. Shiels' impersonation of the "Laird of Dumbedikes" was a most finished delineation of Scotch character. Mr. Wheatleigh's "Counsellor Fairbrother," every one has seen, and every one admires. Miss Belle Divine, who made her first appearance at the Eureka on this occasion, acted and read the part of "Jennie Deans" capitally: she is a valuable accession to the company. Miss Louise Clarkson, who shows most gratifying evidence of improvement, acted "Effie Deans" in a manner which did her infinite credit, reading very correctly, and making all the "points" with a skill which would have done credit to an actress of far more experience on the stage than this young actress has had. Mr. Leach's performance of "David Deans" was very forcible, and elicited several rounds of applause. Mr. H. D. Thompson, who has recently joined the company, played the character of "Ratcliffe" with great ability, doing it full justice. Mrs. Judah was thrillingly tragic as "Meg Murdochson." Mrs. Yeamans deserves credit for her acting in the character of "Madge Wildfire," especially in the scene where she is killed. Mr. Roundy, a young actor, who has played several parts entrusted to him lately very creditably, and who gives hopeful signs of improvement, played "Archibald, the echo valet of the Duke of Argyle," very well. With so many of the parts effectively filled, the piece was, of course, a perfect success, though, in consequence of its having been repeatedly produced in this city, it failed to draw as good houses as its merit deserved. On Thursday, the play of Henry IV. was produced, Mr. Shiel's taking his first benefit on this occasion, and appearing in the character of "Falstaff." Mr. Shiels made a wonderfully good Falstaff, taking everything into consideration; he disguised his Scotch accent with great skill, and, had he exhibited a greater flow of animal spirits, would have been everything that could be desired. Mr. Wheatleigh's "King Henry" was a fine piece of acting, and his reading afforded quite a treat to every lover of Shakspeare. Mr. J. H. Warwick made his first appearance here on this occasion, and played "Hotspur" passably well, subduing his tendency to rant with commendable skill. Miss Belle Divine read and acted the part of "Lady Percy" very creditably, and the piece was carefully played throughout. This afternoon John Brougham's romantic drama of Bel Demonio, or the Beautiful Demon, will be produced with all the accompaniments of new scenery, music, etc. necessary to ensuring its success. At this house Mr. J. H. Warwick plays the "Beautiful Demon." The same piece will be played this evening. During the coming week Mr. Wheatleigh, after working for the amusement of the public, and to provide employment for actors out of place, takes his first benefit, when it is to be hoped he will receive a solid proof of the public's appreciation of his talent and energy. During the week after next, Arrah-na-Pogue will probably be produced at the Metropolitan Theatre, which Mr. Wheatleigh has leased for the purpose of getting more stage room than is afforded in the Eureka. Mr. James Dowling is hard at work on the scenery and machinery, and no expense will be spared in producing this piece in a style of unequalled magnificence. A dramatic revival will shortly occur in San Francisco; it is time it should, for we have been sadly dull of late.

At the Circus, Don Esteban Buislay's ascension of the Spiral Mountain, a height of some seventy feet, on a wooden ball, is a most wonderful sensation. The spectators gaze in breathless anxiety: the swerve of the revolving globe, even a hair's breadth, may cause the adventurous man to lose his balance, and he would be crushed to atoms. Wearily he winds round the column, a profound silence reigns; at last he stands at the summit of the column, his dangerous journey ended; now drawing a long breath of relief, the spectators break forth into loud and prolonged applause. This feat is, indeed, a wonderful one, and varied, as the entertainment at this circus is, this eclipses everything. As Wilson's Grand Circus, the best which has ever visited these shores, will shortly proceed to the Sandwich Islands, and thence to Australia, those who have not seen it should avail themselves of the few evenings during which it will remain here. This afternoon and evening, the Spiral Mountain Ascension will be performed for the last time. To-morrow, a feat, which promises to be equally daring and wonderful—the Niagara Leap—will be performed.

The Academy of Music opened on Wednesday with Hussey's Minstrels. The house was crowded.

TOUCHSTONE.

The Grass Valley National tells of a colt which is smart enough for an old horse. He will eat almost anything that is given him, and chews tobacco like an old victim of the seductive vice. The other day his owner undertook to tempt his appetite with a horned toad, but the pony declined.

The Los Angeles News says the so-called Government Ditch, constructed by the labor of the United States soldiers to supply Drum Barracks with water, is entirely dry, and the troops are now parching for want of their accustomed supply. In many places the flumes have been torn up, and portions of the lumber carried away.

Thomas Scott was murdered at Linden, San Joaquin county, on the night of September 4th, by some unknown party. He had recently been at work on the ranch of J. H. Terry, on the Copperopolis road. $1,000 reward has been offered by the citizens of Linden for the apprehension of the murderer.

The Bajazette and Potosi mining companies have compromised their vexatious lawsuits.

THE NEWGATE WEDDING.

ANOTHER STRAY LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF REAL LIFE.

"I HAVE got myself into a little trouble with Mr. Wontner, the Governor of Newpate," (the principal London prison,) said my old friend, S. R., when I called on him at his chambers one evening—but I am consoling myself it is all smoke, like that which comes out of the pipe I have just lighted to quiet me a little.

"How so," I replied, "surely you have not been breaking prison?" No," he said, "I have not broken prison myself, but I have broken down the prison walls for a pretty young girl who was in charge under sentence in Newgate." "Then you have obtained her discharge, I said; and pray what may it all be about, and how did you manage to effect her release?" "Wait, my friend; don't go too fast: take a chair and sit down, and I will tell you, if you have time—it is not a very long story, and I know you are a pretty good listener."

Expressing my wish to hear him, I sat down, and he began:

"About three or four sessions ago, a young girl—Emily Palmer—was convicted of stealing a shawl belonging to a woman with whom she had a slight acquaintance. According to the evidence on the trial, as appeared by the depositions, a copy of which I have, the case seemed to be clear enough. Her friends came to me about the middle of last month; they brought me the copy of the depositions; I read them and said I thought there was little hope for her. They were very earnest in assuring me she was entirely innocent, and it was a vile conspiracy to ruin a poor girl, and they were very anxious I should take up the case, for she was under sentence of transportation to New South Wales; and, Government being very desirous of supplying the colonies with marriageable young women, her friends were afraid she would be shipped off, and that soon—besides she was under engagement of marriage with a young man who had a respectable shop of business in Whitechapel, and who still continued constant in his affection for her, believing her to be the victim of a conspiracy got up by a spiteful woman or two—and he was still still willing and ready to marry her if she were set at liberty. I discussed the matter with her friends, and told them the difficulty of undoing what had been done; but they persisted in their assertions, and I looked over the depositions, carefully examining all the points, and asked them to give me some information of what answer they could make. On this they entered into various particulars, and promised they should all be collected together and written down for me. One of the parties present—a very respectable, middle-aged lady—told me she was the girl's aunt, and as she had a little money she was resolved to spend some of it in trying to get her niece set free from the prison. She had had the care of the girl ever since the death of her mother, about eight or nine years back, and a better girl did not live, and she wished me to go and see her in the prison; she was determined to get her out if possible. All expressing themselves in this way—for there were four women who had taken up the case—I began to feel an interest for the girl; for my experience in Crown cases enabled me to form an opinion of her situation and its probabilities if the sentence were carried out as they expected it would be. As time was precious, (for an order from the Home Office might come down to the prison at any hour, and she would be sent off the very next morning,) I related to them—putting my instructions in writing—what would be required, and they were to add as much more as they thought would be useful. They worked heartily, and, assisted by the good old aunt, they were able to procure, in much shorter time than I expected, very ample evidence of the girl's innocence of the charge. I put all the facts together in proper shape for the Home Office, and they were certainly a formidable array against the accusation—such as, if produced in defence on the trial, would have most certainly procured an acquittal. I asked why this had not been done; the answer was, people were afraid to come forward—they did not like, and so on; besides, the prosecutrix was such a very spiteful woman they were afraid to come in contact with her; had that been done, I think the prosecutrix and one or two of her witnesses might have found themselves committed to Newgate for perjury before the Court. However, I got it all put into proper form, and such as required I had duly sworn; as a wind-up I had the young man—Thomas Williams, a grocer in Whitechapel—make a declaration in writing that he knew the girl; that he had been acquainted with her for about three years; that her conduct was most modest and free from anything approaching dishonesty or impropriety; that, being a single young man engaged in business, he had made her an offer of marriage which had been accepted, and had not this charge been made against her, which he did not believe to be true, he should have been married to her; and that still maintaining a perfect confidence in her honesty and worthiness of character, he was now ready and willing to marry her if she were discharged from the prison. In addition to these, the old aunt had obtained a certificate from the girl's employers, a well known firm in the city, wholesale umbrella manufacturers, by whom she had been employed as a forewoman for two years past, and who gave a certificate of her trustworthiness and their disbelief of the charge. A number of workpeople, both male and female, in the employ of the same firm, also voluntarily signed a testimonial of her good conduct and honesty. This document was certified by the firm as a correct document, spontaneously given by the persons in their employ. I caused the young man to get a certificate from the clergyman of his parish of his own good character, and the aunt kindly got a similar certificate on behalf of the girl from the clergyman of her parish, under whom she had been for some three or four years acting as a Sunday school teacher."

I expressed my surprise at this formidable array of testimony, hoping it proved successful."

"Yes," said my friend, they made a large number of papers, but recollect it was her last and only chance, and I had to try and convince by truth, for there is so much falsehood sent to the Home Office to procure remission of sentence, I was obliged to be rather crowding in the affair; but I did more: I knew the senior Sheriff, and I went to see him and ask him to take the papers to the Home Secretary himself—"

"But,' said I, "you had not seen the girl herself yet."

"Yes," he replied, "I had, and found her to be a very pretty, modest, retiring sort of a girl, about two and twenty, and the Matron told me she was very docile and obliging, and she hoped I should succeed for her. I took advantage of this, and got the Governor to let the Matron say as much in writing, and he signed it as correct. This request he kindly complied with, at the same time telling me it was not only very unusual, but he had never before been asked to do so; and he would not then grant such a request were I not so well known to him—besides, he wished the girl well. Armed with all these papers, I waited upon Alderman ——, the senior Sheriff, and finding him at home and a little at leisure, I had a conversation with him on the case: he took the papers and said he would read them over, and if they bore out the facts as I had stated to him, he would cheerfully go to the Home Office and present them himself; but he would go the prison that afternoon and see the girl and speak to the Governor—and I was to call on him the next afternoon, which I did without fail. He told me had been to Newgate; he had seen the girl, and the Governor, and the Matron, and he was greatly prepossessed in favor of the prisoner, from observing her quiet modest deportment; he had that morning been so fortunate as to see the Home Secretary, and had delivered the papers with a good word for her from himself."

"'But, my friend, what was the result?—the finish?"

"How impatient you are," said he; "I shall forget the case if you do not let me prose on in my own way."

"Well," I said, "then go on."

So he resumed his narrative: "About a week ago I had a note from the Governor, requesting to see me. I went to him, and found, to my great pleasure, the application for release had been successful, on these conditions: that the Governor, with the Chaplain of the prison, (the Rev. Dr. Cotton,) should take the girl to the church, where they were to meet the young man; that they were to see the marriage ceremony performed, and then leave the girl in charge of her husband. He had accordingly sent for the young man, and had arranged that he should get a marriage license without delay, and come in the morning at the proper hour to the church at Aldgate, and he (the Governor) and the Chaplain, with the girl, would be there to meet him. All this was done, and a great many persons were there, being the friends of both parties. The ceremony was performed by the Chaplain of the prison, at the request of the clergyman of the church, who was present but considered it the Chaplain's right and duty to complete the affair legally. When it was over, and the Governor and Chaplain were preparing to leave, the girl, turning to the former, very innocently and modestly said to him: 'Am I now to go back with you?' 'No, my dear,' said he, 'I leave you now in the custody of your husband, and hope never to see you again in any other as long as you live.' She blushed, and courtsied to him. The chaplain, a good old man, gave the young couple some kind words of advice, and the Governor and Chaplain each kissed the bride as their fee for attending. The place had by that time got rather crowded, and there was great shaking of hands with the officials as they departed for the prison, and cheers for the girl and her husband when the wedding party came outside of the church, and many invocations of blessings upon them; a good many of the women who had come from the manufactory were in tears of joy on the occasion."

"Well," I said, "but what has all this to do with your getting into a scrape with the Governor?—and I hope you got well paid for your services."

"What! by poor people? No; the pleasure of having been of use to an innocent girl, falsely accused of crime, was ample reward for me. I took nothing from them. As to my scrape, it has everything to do with it. I told you the Governor sent for me, and after he had related all the particulars I have been telling you, he added with solemn gravity, (but it was a mock gravity,) 'I hope, young man, you will not have any more such interesting young lady clients put into your hands to get them married and discharged, or I shall be obliged to forbid your coming here.' 'How so?' I asked. 'Why,' said he, 'the day after this affair became known in the women's ward, I had all the unmarried young ones swarming about me, protesting their innocence, and that they had sweethearts who were quite ready and wanted to marry them if they were discharged. For the last two or three days I have been obliged to appear rather severe to them and stop it. So now as you have succeeded so well, young gentleman, with one case, be content, for you might fail in meeting with such a good result in another case, and it will save both you and me much trouble.' We had a glass of wine and a good laugh over the affair, and, wishing all good things to the young couple, we shook hands and I left him, the Governor saying he had to communicate the result to the Home Secretary, and thus end the affair."

"Did you hear what became of the bride and bridegroom?" I asked.

"No," he said "I only heard of them one day, a little while after, from the Governor, that they seemed very happy and comfortable, and the young man was doing a good business and with many new customers—perhaps induced from the novelty of the affair (for it got wind after a little time) to go and see the bride. There was talk of retaliating by a prosecution for perjury, but I advised against it, and the cry for vengeance, as it was called, died out."

I soon after left my friend to enjoy his pipe. He requested I would soon pay him another visit, "for," said he, "I could entertain you by the hour at a time with whimsical and serious cases in which I have been concerned." F. H.

THE HOUSE-FLY AND THE DOG.—I believe we can nowhere find a better type of a perfectly free creature than in the common house fly. Nor free only, but brave; and irreverent to a degree which I think no human republican could by any philosophy raise himself to. There is no courtesy in him; he does not care whether it is king or clown whom he teazes; and in every step of his swift mechanical march, and in every pause of his resolute observation, there is one and the same expression of perfect egotism, perfect independence and self-confidence, and conviction of the world's having been made for flies. Strike at him with your hand. To him the mechanical fact and external aspect of the matter is, what to you it would be, if an acre of red clay, ten feet thick, tore itself up from the ground in one massive field, hovered over you in the air for a second, and came crashing down with an aim! That is the external aspect of it; the inner aspect, to this fly's mind, is of a quite natural and unimportant occurrence—one of the momentary conditions of his active life. He steps out of the way of your hand, and alights on the back of it. You cannot terrify him, nor govern him, nor persuade him, nor convince him. He has his own positive opinion on all matters; not an unwise one, usually, for his own ends; and will ask no advice of yours. He has no work to do—no tyrannical instinct to obey. The earth-worm has his digging and digesting; the bee her gathering and building; the spider her cunning net-work; the ant her treasury and accounts. All these are comparatively slaves, or people of vulgar business. But your fly, free in the air, free in the chamber—a black incarnation of caprice—wandering, investigating, flitting, flirting, feasting at his will, with rich variety of choice in feast, from the heaped sweets in the grocer's window to those of the butcher's back yard, and from the galled place on your cab-horse's back to the brown spot in the road, from which, as the hoof disturbs him, he rises with angry republican buzz—what freedom is like his? For captivity, again, perhaps your poor watch-dog is as sorrowful a type as you will easily find. Mine certainly is. The day is lovely, but I must write this, and cannot go out with him. He is chained in the yard, because I do not like dogs in rooms, and the gardener does not like dogs in gardens. He has no books—nothing but his own weary thoughts for company, and a group of those free flies, whom he snaps at with sullen ill success. Such dim hope that he may have that I may yet take him out with me, will be, hour by hour, disappointed, or worse, darkened at once into a leaden despair by an authoritative "No"—too well understood. His fidelity only seals his fate; (if he would not watch for me, he would be sent away, and go hunting with some happier master; but he watches, and is wise, and faithful, and miserable.) and his high animal intellect only gives him the wistful power of wonder, and sorrow, and desire, and affection, which embitter his captivity. Yet of the two, would we rather be watch-dog or fly?—"John Ruskin," in the Art Journal.

LAWYERS are very technical and critical. Once, quite a young lawyer, upon being informed of an attachment between a young lady and gentleman, inquired whether the gentleman was the "lover or lovee?" So an attorney in Dublin wrote a challenge to a gentleman to meet him in the "Four Acres, be the same more or less."

IMPORTANT TO THE LADIES!

MRS. READ,

NO. 109 MONTGOMERY STREET,
(OVER FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE DEPOT,)

Skirt Supporters and Chest EXPANDERS,

For Expanding the Chest, Strengthening the Lungs and Stomach, Curing the bad habit of Stooping, and Straightening Curvatures of the Spine.

This Supporter possesses more merit than perhaps any other invention, has received the unanimous approbation of those who have used them, and is actually invaluable to every lady wishing to possess
GRACE OF FORM
AND
SYMMETRY OF PERSON.
It is comfortable to the frame, and fits with a nicety never attained by any other invention.

MRS. READ also fits Supporters for HERNIA and RUPTURE, and furnishes an elegant article of
GENTLEMEN'S BRACES AND SUSPENDERS.

MRS. READ also has a beautiful style of BUST,
Indispensable in a Lady's Toilet.

MRS. READ also has a Supporter which she can confidently recommend to Ladies suffering from prolapsus uteri. It has no equal, and is far superior to the many mechanical supporters used in such cases, fitting the form perfectly. It is free from pads and steel, and creates no irritation; gives comfort and ease, with such an amount of support it would seem impossible to do without it.

Ladies, please call and examine for yourselves, or leave your orders, and Mrs Read will wait upon you at your residences.
Mrs. Read will be in attendance at her Reception Room from 8 to 11 A. M. and after 6 P. M. my27-tf

INTERIOR ITEMS.

A MAN named J. H. Denning met with an accident on Monday, August 28th, near Carmen City, by which he lost his life. While in the act of applying the brake to the wheels of his wagon, he lost his balance and fell to the ground, his head striking a rock. Denning resided at the Fifteen Mile House, on the Mariposa road, and leaves a wife and four children to mourn his loss. It seems strange that our wagoners do not adopted a self-acting brake. There is one which appears perfectly reliable—the invention of Lewis, of Iowa. Henry George, of San Francisco, agent for the sale of the patent right, recently exhibited to many of our citizens, a working model of the invention, which was by all pronounced a great and valuable improvement.

THE Wilmington Journal of August 27th says: G. Surdam arrived yesterday from the oil springs of the San Fernando District, with three hundred gallons of Petroleum oil. It is consigned to Banning & Co., for shipment on the next steamer. This oil, by analysis, contains fifty-seven per cent. illuminating and thirty-three per cent. lubricating properties. Surdam returns to the oil springs to-day with cans sufficient to secure eight hundred gallons in time for the following steamer.

LAST night, about 11 o'clock, John Sullivan, a miner working in the Alpha claim, was killed by a cave. He was engaged in working one of the lower levels, and was alone. Only a small quantity of earth fell upon him, yet it apparently killed him instantly, as he was found dead only a few moments after the accident happened. Mr. Sullivan was a native of Ireland, was married, but had no children.—Gold Hill News, Sept. 4th.

THE Union Advocate states that on Saturday last Eastman & Co., sold their quartz ledge, near Russell's diggings, in Amador, to a Sacramento company, for $10,000 cash. Sorocco Brothers & Co., on Monday last, sold their lead and mill, known as the Italian lead and mill, near Pine Grove, to J. T. Farley, of Jackson, at a price, reported from $65,000 to $100,000.

THE Nevada Gazette says that the Star Spangled Banner Company on last Saturday, while drifting on their ledge, struck a cave about thirty feet long by twenty wide and eighteen feet high. The roof was hung with clusters of stalactites, and the floor studded with stalagmites. It is a beautiful chamber.

ON Sunday, September 3d, Mrs. Richardson, who resides about eight miles from Stockton, near the church southeast of French Camp, while returning from the Tuolumne river to her home, fell backward out of the wagon in which she was riding, the seat falling upon her, breaking her collar bone.

THE Placerville Mirror says it has authority for saying that the statement that the Pioneer Stage Company intend to transfer the mail and express business to the Dutch Flat route in September (or at any other time) is unfounded.

NICHOLAS TALLIEUR was found dead in his garden, about two miles from the Mountain View House September 2d. He had apparently been dead about three weeks. His horse was tied up near him, starved to death. He was a native of the Department of Moselle, France, and aged about 43 years. Grass Valley National.

ON Monday afternoon last Janette Askins, of Woodland, Yolo county, a girl thirteen years old, was thrown from a swing while playing with other children, and fatally injured. She continued to live in an unconscious condition until one o'clock the next morning, at which time she expired.

JAMES BROWN, alias James Davis, a native of Liverpool, England, aged about thirty-five, came to his death September 1st, at the Gould & Curry mine, by accidentally falling from a ladder while descending a shaft: he fell about eighty feet, and in five minutes thereafter was found dead.

CAZOTTE'S PREDICTION.

"IT appears but as yesterday, and yet, nevertheless, it was at the beginning of the year 1788. We were dining with one of our brethren at the Academy—a man of considerable wealth and genius. The company was numerous and diversified—courtiers, lawyers, academicians, etc., and, according to the custom, there had been a magnificent dinner. At dessert, the wines of Malvoisin and Constantia added to the gaiety of the guests that sort of liberty which is sometimes forgetful of bon ton; we had arrived in the world just at that time when anything was permitted that would raise a laugh.

* * * * * * *

"One only of the guests had not taken part in the joyousness of the conversation, and had even gently and cheerfully checked our splendid enthusiasm. This was Cazotte, an amiable and original person, but unhappily infatuated with the reveries of the illuminati. He spoke, and with the most serious tone. 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'be satisfied; you will all see this great and sublime revolution, which you so much desire. You know that I am a little inclined to prophecy; I repeat, you will see it.' He was answered by the common rejoinder: 'One need not be a conjuror to see that.' 'Be it so; but perhaps one must be a little more than conjuror for what remains for me to tell you. Do you know what will be the consequence of this revolution—what will be the consequence to all of you, and what will be the immediate result—the well-established effect—the thoroughly-recognized consequence to all of you who are here present?' 'Ah!' said Condorcet, with his insolent and half-suppressed smile, 'let us hear; a philosopher is not sorry to encounter a prophet.' 'You, Monsieur de Condorcet—you will yield up your last breath on the floor of a dungeon; you will die from poison, which you will have taken in order to escape from execution—from poison which the happiness of that time will oblige you to carry about your person.'

"At first, astonishment was most marked; but it was soon recollected that the good Cazotte is liable to dreaming, though apparently wide awake, and a hearty laugh is the consequence. 'Monsieur Cazotte, the relation which you give us is not so agreeable as your Diable Amoureux (a novel of Cazotte's.)

"'But what diable has put into your head this prison, and this poison, and these executioners? What can all these have in common with philosophy and the reign of reason?' 'This is exactly what I say to you; it is in the name of philosophy, of humanity, of liberty; it is under the reign of reason that it will happen to you thus to end your career; and it will, indeed, be the reign of reason, for then she will have her temples, and indeed, at that time, there will be no other temples in France than the temples of reason.' 'By my truth,' said Chamfort, with a sarcastic smile, 'you will not be one of the priests of these temples.' 'I do not hope it: but you, Monsieur de Chamfort, who will be one, and most worthy to be so, you will open your veins with twenty-two cuts of a razor, and yet you will not die till some months afterward.' They looked at each other, and laughed again. 'You, Monsieur Vicq d'Azir, you will not open your own veins, but you will cause yourself to be bled six times in one day, during a paroxysm of the gout, in order to make more sure of your end, and you will die in the night. You, Monsieur de Nicolai, you will die upon the scaffold; you, Monsieur Bailly, on the scaffold; you, Monsieur de Malesecrbes, on the scaffold.' 'Ah! God be thanked,' exclaimed Roucher, 'it seems that Monsiur has no eye but for the Academy; of it he has just made a terrible execution, and I, thank Heaven * * * * *' 'You! you also will die upon the scaffold.' 'Oh, what an admirable guesser,' was uttered on all sides; 'he has sworn to exterminate us all.' 'No, it is not I who have sworn it.' 'But shall we, then, be conquered by the Turks or the Tartars? Yet again * * * 'Not at all; I have already told you, you will then be governed only by philosophy—only by reason. They who will thus treat you will be all philosopers—will always have upon their lips the self-same phrases which you have been putting forth for the last hour—will repeat all your maxims—and will quote, as you have done, the verses of Diderot, and from La Pucelle.' They then whispered among themselves: 'You see that he is gone mad;' for he preserved all this time the most serious and solemn manner. 'Do you not see that he is joking, and you know that, in the character of his jokes, there is always much of the marvellous.' 'Yes,' replied Chamfort, 'but his marvellousness is not cheerful; it savors too much of the gibbet; and when will all this happen?' 'Six years will not pass over before all that I have said to you will be accomplished.'

"'Here are some astonishing miracles (and, this time, it was I myself who spoke), but you have not included me in your list.' 'But you will be there as an equally extraordinary miracle; you will then be a Christian'

"Vehement exclamations on all sides. 'Ah,' replied Chamfort, 'I am comforted; if we shall perish only when La Harpe shall be a Christian, we are immortal.'

"'As for that,' then observed Madame la Duchesse de Grammont, 'we women, we are happy to be counted for nothing in these revolutions: when I say for nothing, it is not that we do not always mix ourselves up with them a little; but it is a received maxim that they take no notice of us, and of our sex' 'Your sex, ladies, will not protect you this time; and you had far better meddle with nothing, for you will be treated entirely as men, without any difference whatever.' 'But what, then, are you really telling us of, Monsieur Cazotte? You are preaching to us the end of the world.' 'I know nothing on this subject; but what I do know is, that you, Madame la Duchesse, will be conducted to the scaffold, you and many other ladies with you, in the cart of the executioner, and with your hands tied behind your back.' 'Ah, I hope that, in that case, I shall at least have a carriage hung in black.' 'No, madame; higher ladies than yourself will go, like you, in the common car, with their hands tied behind them.' 'Higher ladies! what! the princesses of the blood?' 'Still more exalted personages.' Here a sensible emotion pervaded the whole company, and the countenance of the host was dark and lowering: they began to feel that the joke was becoming too serious.

"Madame de Grammont, in order to dissipate the cloud, took no notice of the reply, and contented herself with saying in a careless tone: 'You see that he will not leave me even a confessor.' 'No, madame, you will not have one—neither you, nor any one besides. The last victim to whom this favor will be afforded will be * * * *' He stopped for a moment. 'Well! who then will be the happy mortal to whom this prerogative will be given?' 'Tis the only one which he will have then retained—and that will be the king of France.'

"The master of the house rose hastily, and every one with him. He walked up to M. Cazotte, and addressed him with a tone of deep emotion: 'My dear Monsieur Cazotte, this mournful joke has lasted long enough. You carry it too far—even so far as to derogate from the society in which you are, and from your own character.' Cazotte answered not a word, and was preparing to leave, when Madame de Grammont, who always sought to dissipate serious thoughts, and to restore the gaiety of the party, approached him, saying: 'Monsieur the prophet, who has foretold us of our good fortune, you have told us nothing of your own.' He remained silent for some time, with downcast eyes. 'Madame, have you ever read the seige of Jerusalem, in Josephus?' 'Yes! who has not read that? But answer as if I had never read it.' 'Well, then, madame, during the seige, a man, for seven days in succession, went round the ramparts of the city, in sight of the besiegers and besieged, crying unceasingly, with an ominous and thundering voice: 'Woe to Jerusalem!'—and the seventh time he cried: 'Woe to Jerusalem—woe to myself!' And at that moment an enormous stone projected from one of the machines of the besieging army, and struck him and destroyed him.'"—Memoirs of La Harpe.

MANAGEMENT OF CARPETS.—All kinds of carpets will wear much longer if fine straw be spread evenly on the floor, about half an inch thick, before they are fastened down. When they lie on the bare floor, the gritty dust works through them to the floor, and as they are pressed down on and among it, they will be worn out much more than when kept up by straw. To aid in drawing carpets close up to the base-board, preparatory to nailing them, drive eight or ten small nails into a piece of wood, allowing them to extend about three-eighths of an inch beyond the surface, similar to a weaver's stretcher, and file them to a sharp point. With such an instrument as this, having a long handle, one person can thrust the side of a carpet up close to the base-board, and hold it with ease, till it is nailed. There is some science also as to the manner of sweeping carpets correctly. Instead of inclining the handle of the broom forward, and rolling the dirt along and pressing it into the carpet, by bearing down on the broom, the handle should be held nearly erect, and the dirt brushed along, by toudhing the carpet very lightly. In this way, both broom and carpet will be worn less, and the sweeping be done better.

THE Oroville Record says: The late Indian hunt, under charge of Captain Goode, was probably the most successful one ever made in this State. It is evident from numerous articles found upon the trail, and also in the cave, that the Indians killed were the ones that committed the outrages at Concow Valley, and we are reliably informed that out of the whole number, sixteen, only four Indians made their escape.

THE CONNECTICUT LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY organized in 1847, with a guaranteed capital of $50,000; Eliphalet A. Bulkley was its first President, and Guy R. Phelps, Secretary. This company has been successful from the first, and has grown to be, in the number of its policy-holders, the largest company in the world, and its business for the past year was greater than that of any other Life Insurance Company in the world. The whole number of policies issued is 43,386, of which 24,054 are now in force, covering an aggregate risk of over $60,000,000. It has paid in losses, on 1,729 lives, the sum of $3,952,762; and in dividends, $2,812,904. Its capital and assets, February 1st, were $7,918,896, nearly eight millions. During the year ending February 1st, 8,115 policies were issued, $482,387 were paid in losses, on 201 lives, and $343,767 in dividends; its receipts for premiums were $2,381,954, and for interest on investments $556,608, making total receipts for the year, $2,938,562, nearly three millions. During the past four years, its interest on investments has been more than sufficient to pay the losses. The present officers of the Connecticut Mutual Life are, James Goodwin, President; Guy R. Phelps, Secretary.

HOME MANUFACTURES.—It is the duty of every Californian to give encouragement to the productions of our own State, and, all other things being equal, preference should be shown to our manufactures. Now, in the matter of cloth, things are at least equal, and when we examine the fine suits of fashionable clothing for sale at Quincy Hall, we incline to the idea that our productions have the advantage. This is the pioneer establishment in manufacturing clothing from California cloth, having commenced it in April last. Their work gives general satisfaction, and we are pleased to learn that their business in this line is steadily increasing. Our advice to our readers is, to call and examine for themselves at Nos. 545, 557 and 549 Washington street.—Call.

MACHINES SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

The almost incredible increase in the sale of the Singer Machine during the past two years is owing to the popularity of the LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE Family Machine, which was introduced in 1860, since which time it has earned and established a reputation for family uses equal to the celebrated manufacturing machines of this firm, which are generally acknowledged even by dealers in other sewing machines, to be unequalled for such purposes.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physcians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M.D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "uttermost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both *SETH W. OUR PUBLIC SERVANTS AND THEIR WAGES.

UNDER this head, the New York Weekly Review gives an able article on the insufficiency of the present salaries paid our principal public officers: "The city of Washington presents some curious anomalies. There is a gentleman there, for example, who has the disbursing of seven hundred million dollars a year, about two millions a day, and has control of several thousands of government officers. He is, besides, one of the advisers of the President, and sits in cabinet counsels next to the Secretary of State. As Treasurer of the United States, he is the custodian and manager of a debt of three thousand millions of dollars, the interest of which he must be prepared to pay on designated days, at 10 A. M., or the national credit is lost. In short, he fills an office which demands the ablest financial mind now extant, on this or any other planet.

"A stranger, on learning the nature and extent of this gentleman's duties, might be excused for asking what stupendous sum per annum, the United States thought it worth while to pay for his services. We give the president of a bank ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year; the president of an insurance company, as much; the president of a railway company, more; while many men, by mere dealing in public securities, enjoy incomes greater than those of some sovereign princes and exhibit to the frequenters of the Park equipages of royal splendor. A foreigner would naturally conclude that the mainspring of all this financial machinery, the man whose single error could bring it into confusion or smash it to pieces, must receive an income that would enable him, also, to provide for his horses carved rosewood mangers, and marble drinking troughs.

"He would certainly be astonished to learn that the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury was only eight thousand per year. It is rather astonishing. We hesitate whether to call it sublime or ridiculous. It has both a sublime aspect and a ridiculous one. When we see a man disbursing public money at the rate of two hundred thousand dollars an hour, and remaining so poor that he cannot ask a friend or two to dinner without an anxious calculation of the expense, it looks sublime. But when we contemplate a great and wealthy nation willing to pay such wages to such a servant, it seems purely ridiculous.

"Now, what is eight thousand dollars a year in the city of Washington? A single fact will tell. The rent of such a house in that city as is suitable to a member of the cabinet—that is, a good-sized, three story house of brick, in a convenient part of the town—is three thousand dollars a year. Every one knows that where rent is high, everything else is high. A man that pays three thousand dollars a year rent, cannot keep house decently and comfortably on an income less than five times that sum: nor on that, unless he is blessed with a sensible and economical wife. He could not well educate a family on it, let her be ever so good a manager. Why, last winter, milk in the city of Washington was twenty-one cents a quart; from that item every housekeeper can form an idea of the weekly bills which a Washington grocer and butcher present to an agonized pater-familias.

"These remarks apply to all the members of the Cabinet; to all the judges of the Supreme Court; to all the higher servants of the public, and in some degree to the President himself. A Cabinet-Minister with a scratch of his pen at the bottom of a contract, makes a man rich, and then goes home to consult with his wife, over their cold mutton—whether he had better have his old coat repaired, or buy a new one; and whether it will pay best to have her silk dress turned or get a new mousline de laine. A General surrounded by a brilliant staff, contractors in magnificent carriages, dash up to the door of his office; while he, poor man, unless he has a private fortune, must trudge in his patched boots on foot. That, however, is no hardship, for the walk does him good. The real hardship of his case is that while he is working day and night for his country, his country does not pay his necessary household expenses. The consequence is, that no man can afford to fill those high places unless he has considerable property of his own, or unless he means to make them yield him personal advantages of some kind."

The Review urges that the appointmentment of subordinates should be permanent, and concludes with the following: "Pass this subject round, brother editors. For our part, our motto is: Decent salaries to the heads of government, and permanent appointments to the subordinates; meaning by decent salaries, salaries upon which a decent establishment can be kept. That is to say: President, thirty-five thousand, (about what it cost Washington and Jackson;) member of the cabinet, twenty thousand; Chief-Justice, fifteen thousand; Associate-Justice, twelve thousand. Those sums, it is true, are less than any other leading nation pays for similar services; but considering all things, they might do."

WHAT young ladies won the battle of Salamis? The Miss Tocles (Themistocles.)

A CANTER will give you ruddy cheeks; a decanter will give you a ruddy nose.

THE MOURNER A-LA-MODE.

BY J. G. SAXE.

I SAW her last night at a party
(The elegant party at Mead's,)
And looking remarkably hearty
For a widow so young in her weeds;
Yet I know she was suffering sorrow
Too deep for the tongue to express,
Or why had she chosen to borrow
So much from the language of dress?

Her shawl was as sable as night;
And her gloves were as dark as her shawl;
And her jewels—that flashed in the light—
Were black as a funeral pall;
Her robe had the hue of the rest
(How nicely it fitted her shape!)
And the grief that was heaving her breast
Boiled over in billows of crape!

What tears of vicarious woe,
That else might have sullied her face,
Were kindly permitted to flow
In ripples of ebony lace!
While even her fan, in its play,
Had quite a lugubrious scope,
And seemed to be waving away
The ghost of the angel of Hope!

Yet rich as the robes of a queen
Was the sombre apparel she wore;
I'm certain I never had seen
Such a sumptuous sorrow before;
And I couldn't help thinking the beauty,
In mourning the loved and the lost,
Was doing her conjugal duty
Altogether regardless of cost!

One surely would say a devotion
Performed at so vast an expense,
Betrayed an excess of emotion
That was really something immense;
And yet as I viewed, at my leisure,
Those tokens of tender regard,
I thought: It is scarce without measure
The sorrow that goes by the yard!

Ah! grief is a curious passion;
And yours—I am sorely afraid,
The very next phase of the fashion
Will find it beginning to fade;
Though dark are the shadows of grief,
The morning will follow the night,
Half-tints will betoken relief,
Till joy shall be symboled in white!

Ah, well! it were idle to quarrel
With Fashion, or aught she may do;
And so I conclude with a moral
And metaphor—warranted new:
When measles come handsomely out,
The patient is safest, they say;
And the sorrow is mildest, no doubt,
That works in a similar way!

THE DEAN'S DOG.—A few days ago the Dean of Carlisle went into a High School during lesson hours, and his dog, a pretty little terrier, followed him. The dog caused a slight disturbance by getting under the desks, and as the dean left he jocularly observed that he should expect a Latin epigram on his dog as a punishment. The boys accordingly sent him the following:

DE CANE DECANI.

Carmen Canium.

Cerberus inferni tueatur regna tyranni:
Est tibi* cœlestis, vir reverende, canis.
Scis bene tu pueris ludos dare gaudia fessis,
Neve canem frustra, caro Decane, canam.

Need we add that the dean, with his usual good humor, took the hint, and asked for a half-holiday for the authors? Carlisle Journal.

* A Sky terrier.

SAID a very high functionary to his scapegrace son: "Look at me! here am I, at the top of the tree; and what is my reward? Why, when I die, my son is the greatest rascal in England!" To this young Hopeful made answer: "Yes dad, when you die, but not till then!"

IN one of the Dutch churches in a rural village on the Hudson, a good old man was acting in the capacity of master of ceremonies at the funeral of a highly respected citizen. As is customary on such occasions, he invited the assembled mourners to view the corpse of their departed friend, and in the following language: "All can now have the pleasure of looking at the last remains of the oldest man now living in the town of S——. Pass up the broad aisle and down the right-hand alley."

A PERSON'S character depends a good deal upon his bringing up. For instance, a man who has been brought up by the police, seldom turns out respectable.

NIGHT AND MOONLIGHT.

MANY men walk by day; few walk by night. It is a very different season. Take a July night, for instance. About ten o'clock,—when man is asleep, and day fairly forgotten,—the beauty of moonlight is seen over lonely pastures where cattle are silently feeding. On all sides novelties present themselves. Instead of the sun there are the moon and stars, instead of the wood-thrush there is the whip-poor-will—instead of butterflies in the meadows, fire-flies, winged sparks of fire! who would have believed it? What kind of cool deliberate life dwells in those dewy abodes associated with a spark of fire? So man has fire in his eyes, or blood, or brain. Instead of singing birds, the half-throttled note of a cuckoo flying over, the croaking of frogs, and the intenser dream of crickets. But above all, the wonderful trump of the bull-frog, ringing from Maine to Georgia. The potato-vines stand upright, the corn grows apace, the bushes loom, the grain-fields are boundless. On our open river terraces once cultivated by the Indian, they appear to occupy the ground like an army—their heads nodding in the breeze. Small trees and shrubs are seen in the midst, overwhelmed as by an inundation. The shadows of rocks and trees, and shrubs and hills, are more conspicuous than the objects themselves. The slightest irregularities in the ground are revealed by the shadows, and what the feet find comparatively smooth appears rough and diversified in consequence. For the same reason the whole landscape is more variegated and picturesque than by day. The smallest recesses in the rocks are dim and cavernous; the ferns in the wood appear of tropical size. The sweet fern and indigo in overgrown wood-paths wet you with dew up to your middle. The leaves of the shrub-oak are shining as if a liquid were flowing over them. The pools seen through the trees are as full of light as the sky. "The light of the day takes refuge in their bosoms," as the Purana says of the ocean. All white objects are more remarkable than by day. A distant cliff looks like a phosphorescent space on a hillside. The woods are heavy and dark. Nature slumbers. You see the moonlight reflected from particular stumps in the recesses of the forest, as if she selected what to shine on. These small fractions of her light remind one of the plant called moonseed—as if the moon were sowing it in such places.

In the night the eyes are partly closed or retire into the head. Other senses take the lead. The walker is guided as well by the sense of smell. Every plant and field and forest emits its odor now, swamp-pink in the meadow and tansy in the road; and there is the peculiar dry scent of corn which has begun to show its tassels. The senses both of hearing and smelling are more alert. We hear the tinkling of rills which we never detected before. From time to time, high up on the sides of hills, you pass through a stratum of warm air, a blast which has come up from the sultry plains of noon. It tells of the day, of sunny noon-tide hours and banks, of the laborer wiping his brow and the bee humming amid flowers. It is an air in which work has been done—which men have breathed. It circulates about from wood-side to hill-side like a dog that has lost its master, now that the sun is gone. The rocks retain all night the warmth of the sun which they have absorbed. And so does the sand. If you dig a few inches into it you find a warm bed. You lie on your back on a rock in a pasture on the top of some bare hill at midnight, and speculate on the height of the starry canopy. The stars are the jewels of the night, and perchance surpass anything which day has to show. A companion with whom I was sailing one very windy but bright moonlight night, when the stars were few and faint, thought a man could get along with them—though he was considerably reduced in his circumstances—that they were a kind of bread and cheese that never failed. Thoreau's Excursions.

DURING one of the first performances of the Troratore in Prague, a funny event occurred to "Leonora." "Manrico" had been condemned by his unnatural brother, the "Count," who had given the customary order to his satellites, "Conduct him to death." The order, however, was misunderstood by the faithful but unreasoning supers, who, allowing the Troubadour to go on unaccompanied to execution, turned and began dragging at the prostrate "Leonora." That embarrassed prima donna, dreadfully confounded, at length burst out in pure Viennese, with "Aber lasst's mi doch ligen, und ziegt's mi nit!" "Anglice," "Do leave me alone, and don't haul at me!) to which request an irrepressible super loudly replied: "No, miss, we've got to arrest you." The audience burst into laughter, and the curtain fell.

AN old gentleman was relating a story of one of your "half-horse, half-alligator" St. Lawrence boatmen. Says he: "He has a hard head, for he stood under an oak in a thunder-storm, when the lightning struck the tree, and he dodged it seventeen times, when finding he could not dodge it any longer, he stood and took the claps in succession on his head, and never flinched."

WHEN is a pointer not a pointer? When he won't point at a bird; in that case is not a pointer a disappointer?

JUPITER AND SQUARZA.

[AFTER BON GAULTIER.]

"Take away this clammy nectar!"
Said the king of gods and men;
"Never at Olympus' table
Let that trash be served again.
Ho, Lyæus, thou, the beery!
Quick—invent some other drink;
Or, in a brace of shakes, thou standest
On Cocytus' sulphury brink!"

Terror shook the limbs of Bacchus,
Palely grew his pimpled nose,
And already in his rearward
Felt he Jove's tremendous toes;
When a bright idea struck him—
"Dash my thyrsus in the lunch!"
For you never were in Frisco,
And you know not Squarza's Punch!"

"Bring it!" quoth the Cloud-compeller;
And the wine-god brought the liquor—
"Champagne and nectar are nought to it!
Bring me more, Bac.! come, be quicker!"
And Saturnius drank and nodded,
Winking with his lightning eyes;
And amidst the constellations
Did the star of SQUARZA rise!

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty o operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

For particulars address DULL & GEORGE, San Francisco, or apply at Whitbeck's wagon factory, Market street above First. ap8 tf

SUNSET.

The mountains stand,
Clearly defined—against the blood-red sky:
The waves, retreating from the rocky strand
Into the mist and gloom, go hand in hand,
To sob and die.

The night comes on,
Trailing toward the west her dusky robe:
One bright star sits in beauty, all alone,
Upon the brow of night, as on a throne,
Queen of the globe.

In such a light,
So filled with glory, let me ever lie:
With mountains, sunset, and the gloom of night,
The waves retreating, till they seem to smite
The blood-red sky.

INGLE.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE Spiritualists of New York have got up discussion meetings, at which they challenge the orthodox clergy to disprove the doctrines held by spiritualists. At a recent meeting, Colonel R. D. Godwin the President, stated that "the society was not a spiritual one. The society was known as the 'Religio-Political Association,' and had for its object the proving of all things." It has a nice little job in hand. Mrs. Ella E. Hobart, late Chaplain of the Wisconsin "Live Eagle Regiment," took the floor in defence of spiritualism, but did not do much in the way of "proving all things," or, indeed, anything. She compared the evidence of the miracles of Christ with those of spiritualism, and abused people for doubting them, saying:

"No, ye are blind as never bat was blind,
With a burning, blood-shot, blindness of the heart,
A swimming, swollen, senselessness of soul."

Good gracious! What a dreadful thing it must be not to believe in spiritualism, if one has, in consequence of such disbelief, such alliterative ailments as "a burning, blood-shot, blindness of the heart," and "a swimming, swollen, senselessness of soul!" We have every desire to be converted to a belief in spiritualism, but find it utterly impossible. We are forced to decline having any communications with spirits who will not frame their communications in decent English, and who persist in writing abominable doggerel. If the music of the spheres is anything like the "poetry" of the spheres, we don't want to hear it. It is really dreadful to think that a spirit can have "progressed" through three spheres and have arrived at the fourth without having mastered the first rudiments of English grammar. At the last seance we attended, after receiving several shockingly ungrammatical communications, we cried in the anguish of our soul, "If there be a grammatical spirit present let him communicate." We received no response.

IN an art exhibition in Edinburgh is a bust of "Joy." That must be a jolly bust, indeed.

How true it is that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country! Also, how true is it that the daily press of the State of California, instead of doing what lies in their power to elevate the literature of the State, and to lend encouragement to home talent, seem to have entered into a conspiracy to crush it down. The editors of California papers appear either to be afraid to trust their own judgment in making literary selections, or else they look upon literary papers as rivals, and therefore fear to give them any encouragement. The literary papers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia republish articles and poems from THE CALIFORNIAN in every issue. When the Eastern papers containing these extracts arrive here, then the newspapers of this State appear for the first time to become aware of their merit; if they are published without credit, so much the better; under these circumstances they are sure of going the rounds of the California press after having travelled through the columns of a dozen Eastern papers. This was the fate of Bret Harte's "Aged Stranger." After returning from its trip to New York, it was immediately published, without credit, by the Sacramento Bee, and has since been reprinted by almost every paper in the State. Charles Warren Stoddard's beautiful poems, which have appeared originally in THE CALIFORNIAN, have been copied into most of the Eastern literary papers, and, after being thus endorsed, the editors of California papers have ventured to reproduce them. In some instances the editor has cut off the first name, "Charles," and credited the poem to "Stoddard," simply, believing it to have been written by the New York poet instead of by our young California poet. Can anything good come out of Nazareth? is still the cry. Puck, which has been endorsed by the New York Leader as "the best paper of the kind ever published in this country," meets with the same treatment as THE CALIFORNIAN. Puck's jokes are copied into New York papers without credit, and on their return here are immediately reproduced in the columns of California papers, the editors of which did not know how good they were until New York editors told them. Mrs. Grundy, the New York comic paper, over which the literary papers of that city lament, as being dull, is puffed into notice by nearly every paper in California, by papers which carefully refrain from mentioning the name of the San Francisco comic paper which the New York editors delight to honor. Columns of THE CALIFORNIAN are reproduced in Eastern papers; Bret Harte's poems and condensed novels are being republished in every paper in the Atlantic States, and will, in course of time—as soon as the "credit" has dropped off accidentally—be published anonymously in Californian papers. The New York Leader publishes "Mouse-Trap" paragraphs by the half-dozen, localizing them to suit New York, and "leading" them as editorial; the other Eastern papers follow suit. It is gratifying to find that THE CALIFORNIAN is thus appreciated by the press of the whole of the United States—except California—and is at this day perhaps the most extensively copied from of any paper published in America. It would, perhaps, under these circumstances, be judicious for THE CALIFORNIAN to move eastward, but we believe the proprietors are far too public-spirited to make such a move, and that they will continue their efforts to elevate the literary taste of California, to give encouragement to the genius and talent which we have in our midst, and do their part towards preventing young litterateurs from being driven to contribute to Eastern papers in the hope of obtaining abroad that recognition and encouragement which is denied them at home.

ONE of "the Flag's poets," his poor feet aching in consequence of our having trodden on his corns, attempts to defend his lines which we took exception to recently, by republishing them in connection with two extracts from what he calls "Homer's Iliad," (meaning, we suppose, "Pope's Iliad,") and Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. His defence he thus introduces:

"POETIC LICENSES.—Mr. Editor: As our 'Bohemians' are fond of scanning, I have placed some extracts here in 'Our Corner,' for their more extended practice and discipline."

Could we afford the space, we should be glad to give this young "poet" a little information. We can inform him that he will find many instances of false metre in Pope's translation of the Iliad, the greater part of which was never written by Pope, but sub-contracted to Grub-street poets; but two wrongs do not make a right, nor, indeed, do three; the fact of Byron, Pope, (not Homer,) and "one of the Flag's poets," writing rhymes in which the metre is defective, does not justify the others in following their example.

THAT particularly intelligent sheet, the Gold Hill News, publishes a paragraph headed "Sample Secesh," in which it states that a pamphlet copy of the trial of John Y. Beall, in the Mercantile Library, San Francisco, is penciled in the margin so as to make "sentenced" read "murdered." The News winds up thus:

"This secesh-edited report has been in the rack of the Library Association for some time. Of what sort of politics is the Librarian?"

Ah, that's the question! And "of what sort of" religion is he? There are such words as "bosh," "humbug," etc., penciled in religious books. And "of what sort of" literary taste is he to allow people to pencil "nonsense" in the margin of copies of Byron's poems? There are only nineteen thousand books in the Mercantile Library, and, as he has nothing to do, he might at least turn over the pages of each one of them some afternoon, and rub out pencil marks.

THE editor of the Sunday Mercury, who understands no Latin, and only enough French to make him dangerous, his accentuation of words in that language being sufficiently appalling to drive any moderately intelligent poodle into howling convulsions, prefaces a communication from a correspondent who signs himself "Viator," with the statement that neither the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle nor the "Mouse-Trap Man" of the Californian has a correct knowledge of Latin, and "are both in the habit of lugging in Latin quotations, very much after the style of Dr. Pangloss in the play." The editor is emboldened to make this assertion concerning a matter of which he can himself have no knowledge whatever, by "Viator's" asking why we took the trouble "to search for such a formidable array of authorities, to prove that 'nascetur,' and not nascitur, is correct, in the well known quotation from Horace." He then asks if we are not aware that, if the word "nascitur" were used, the line would not scan. Most certainly, we were aware of this; we were also aware that the Delphine edition of Horace would be sufficient authority, without calling in the support of Webster's Unabridged; but would it be sufficient to tell the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle that the line he quoted would not scan? We opine not. For this reason, we made a great pretense of piling up authorities, which, we imagined, was more funny than simply saying, "It won't scan." We thought we had given proof enough, and that as conclusive as "Viator's;" but, if he is not satisfied, we will gladly add his little contribution; we can assure him that, however much the editor of the Mercury may have been impressed by his wondrous display of classical lore, we were perfectly aware of the nature of dactyles and pondees. As to the wriggling contortions of the editor of the Dramatic Chronicle, in endeavoring to get out of the terrible scrape into which he got himself by meddling with the "Mouse Trap," they are painful to witness. He devoted a whole column in Wednesday's paper to misrepresentation. He was perfectly aware that we quoted the line directly from Horace, saying "like those of whom Horace said, etc.," and that we therefore could not change the tense. The editor of the Chronicle had better own at once that his Latin is a little dusty from want of use, and that he had not the slightest idea that Horace was the author of the line which we quoted, until informed of it by us. Had he known it, he would have known also, as "Viator" says, that the line with nascitur would not scan. Will the editor of the Chronicle now be content to throw up the sponge?

THE telegraphic news since the squelching of the Rebellion is highly important. A U. S. officer fell in love with a "yellow gal," and a respectable young man who was in love with the same party murdered him. They are going to have postoffices down south again. A bold Feniau in Ireland has been arrested by the police. Somebody in Paris thinks it is very likely that the rebels in that city would be pleased to see a war between France and the United States about Mexico, and wishes the Government and the people to look well to the matter. Mr. Breckinridge is in Canada. Mr. Grimer is reappointed Receiver of the Land Office at Santa Fe, near Mexico. The telegraph neglects to state whether or not he will take Mrs. Grimer and the little Grimers with him. Surely, under these circumstances, the proprietors of the Alta and Bulletin, if they ever were in favor of peace, are now heartily in favor of the next war.

"COSMOS," who says he has "written for the Bulletin over nine years as 'Cosmos,'" is highly indignant at some other man writing to the Bulletin as "Cosmos." He says he thinks he has "a right to ask others to let 'Cosmos,' as a nom de plume, alone." He then immediately signs his name as "Cosmos No. I." He has settled the difficulty by adopting a new nom de plume. Now, just as we have Shiner No. 1 and Shiner No. 2, so have we a Cosmos No. 1 and a Cosmos No. 2. We hope Shiner No. 1—no, Cosmos No 1, we mean—will write a better letter next time he writes to the Bulletin. His last communication is dreadfully "slangy," and there are too many inverted commas in it. After Shiner—that is Cosmos No. 1—has written nine years more for the Bulletin, his style will, no doubt, become more polished.

THE Paris correspondent of a London newspaper is very much horrified at a dramatization of Milton's "Paradise Lost," which is being played at one of the theatres. He says:

"The idea of so brutalizing one's ideas of Paradise as to have it represented by the scene-painter, with the tree of knowledge in the second grooves, and Adam and Eve disputing about the forbidden fruit in language not even of the choicest description, is astonishing enough, but when, in the fourth act, the sons of Cain are represented dancing a ballet, with modern sensuous accessories, it becomes to an English mind simply shocking, or even disgusting."

Poor fellow! we sympathize with him. He could stand the tree of knowledge in the second grooves; could tolerate the representation of Adam and Eve engaged in a little family quarrel; but the idea of the sons of Cain dancing a ballet is simply shocking, or even disgusting! It is, indeed, very shocking. We wonder that the dramatist had not more respect for their father than to represent them engaged in such unseemly amusement.

TREM

THE LITTLE OAK WARDROBE.

THE quiet old town of Abbeylands was on the eve of going to sleep: several of the oil-lamps had retired from public life after winking in a mysterious manner to their companions to follow their example; the shops in the High Street had already put up their shutters; the rain was falling in torrents; the chimney tops were veering in all directions, as if performing a demoniac polka with the inconstant wind; a miserable wet night, about ten o'clock, and not a soul stirring. The three policemen had gone home; the thieves, if there were any, were afraid of catching cold; the surgeon had just returned from a country visit and was putting up his horse in the little stable behind his house; waiters at the Pigeon's Arms were flying about in all directions with suppers, and slippers, and cigars, and brandies and waters; and far away from the coffee-room—not in a private apartment, seven shillings and six pence a day—but in a low, dingy, little bed-room, which served him for a parlor and all, a young man was standing with arms folded across his breast and looking into a trunk which he had recently opened. "A stock in trade," he said, "from which something may be made after all!

"Yes, from that small box may be evoked powers as tremendous as the genii's in the Arabian Nights—wealth—happiness—revenge—and that's the best of all!"

Nothing was visible to account for these glowing anticipations. The contents seemed of the ordinary kind—clothes—not many, nor very splendid in material; only among them were mixed up pieces of apparel belonging properly to the softer sex: crumpled-up bonnets, worn-out old shawls, faded cotton gowns. Poor fellow! he was perhaps bringing down presents to an aunt. They couldn't be very expensive ones, but the kindness of the remembrance would make up for the want of value. "Hark! ten o'clock!" he said, as the Abbey clock struck the hour. "I must be off, or the old rascal will have shut up shop." He buttoned his coat, threw a sporting looking horse-cloth over his shoulders, and emerged into the dusky street. "I saw it," he said, "at the corner of the stair-case. If the villain hasn't moved it, all will go well. If he has, how can I describe it without exciting suspicion?"

One shop was open in the cross-road at the top of the main street. A great glaring lamp still flourished in front of the window; under it, and sheltered by a sort of verandah that projected over half the pavement, was standing a deal table with two chairs on the top of it: on them were various articles of crockery-ware, useful and ornamental; a small swing glass marked in chalk two shillings and six pence; and, between the chairs, a little pile of books, the lowest being The Whole Duty of Man, and the highest The Wandering Jew. Inside of the dark recess, where innumerable goods were piled up on both sides of a narrow passage, sat a man with a pen behind his ear; a ledger lay before him, which he might perhaps have been able to read, if he had felt so inclined, with the aid of a very thin and dirty farthing candle, which was stuck into an ink bottle; but his studies lay in another direction. He was absorbed in thought. "After all," he thought, "what good has it done me? It isn't so great a sum when all's told. Two hundred and thirty pounds wouldn't ruin the Bank of England. It ruined George Evans, though," he began again. "His father should have kept his papers better. If the man was fool enough to lend me the money, and lost my note of hand, what business is it of mine, that his son must lose the whole of it? Did I make the law? If they had brought me my acknowledgement, wouldn't the money have been paid? The lad has given up pestering me with his letters. I hope never to hear of him again; besides, the Statute of Limitations makes it also safe, and the money by this time would all have been spent; for I hear he has turned a reprobate, and gone on the stage. This is a wicked world, and theatres are the schools of Satan. Amen!"

This ejaculation was uttered aloud, and was considered by the utterer of it, Mr. Benson, pawnbroker and second-hand furniture merchant—the bond and seal of all religious observations. It was heard by the young man in the horse-cloth wrapper.

"I'm glad you're not shut up, sir," he said, going through the narrow gangway to the end of the room. "I want to do a little business with you."

"A watch?" said Mr. Benson, opening a little drawer, in which lay a number of square tickets of dirty paper.

"No; I don't happen to have such a thing," replied the visitor. "I come to buy something. As I passed the shop to-day, I saw a piece of furniture I require; a narrow case, with drawers in it, of oak I think it was. Ah! there it is, just under the staircase."

"Of oak indeed! you may say of the very finest oak that ever grew in clay. Why, that oak would fetch a large price, independent of the great convenience of the drawers. I paid a pretty sum for it at Farmer Merriwood's sale, when the old gentleman died, ten days since; it had been in his family, they said, two hundred years—a very fine piece of furniture, and dirt cheap at one pound ten."

"I'm no great judge of these things," said the young man; "but I have an aunt in the town who is in want of just such an article. I wish to make her a present of it; and I will pay for it now, on condition that if she doesn't like it, you shall take it back and supply me with another article to-morrow morning."

"Very fair—that's very fair—but how can I send it to-night?"

"Nay, that must be part of the bargain," replied the purchaser, counting the money into Mr. Benson's hand; "and you must also give me a receipt for the—what shall we call it—the wardrobe, with all it contains; for fortunes are sometimes found in very odd places," he added, with a smile. "I've heard of chair bottoms being stuffed with five pound notes."

"I run the risk of all that," said Mr. Benson, writing the receipt, "and as to carrying it home, it ain't very heavy. I'll manage that. What's the address?"

"Mrs. Truman, number two, Abbeyfield Lane," replied the youth, "not a very elegant part of the town, but the poor must live somewhere."

"It's a very dark, ill-charactered place," said the pawnbroker. "Couldn't you wait till to-morrow morning? A man was robbed and murdered there twenty years ago."

"Oh, things are improved since then," said the young man with a laugh; "besides an old chest of drawers is not so very tempting a property, in spite of the goodness of the oak, and the time it was in Farmer Merriwood's possession."

Mr. Benson looked at his visitor with doubt at first, but he saw nothing but the fine open countenance of a young man of twenty-two, and gradually became satisfied that there was nothing to be afraid of. For one instant a thought even came into his head to invite the purchaser to take a glass of gin and water—but it died away, like other good resolutions.

"If you arrive at my aunt's before me," said the young man, "say I sent her the wardrobe; but I hope to be there in time to receive you." So saying, he wrapt his horse-cloth closer round him, and departed.

Mr. Benson looked round well pleased. He had ended the day well by disposing of a useless piece of lumber at a considerable price. "He must be very fond of his aunt, that young man," he said, "and if she's no better judge of furniture than he is, I wish she would come and deal at my shop." He cast a look round, to see that there was no danger from candle or lamp, hoisted the wardrobe on his shoulder, locked the door, and walked rapidly towards Abbeyfield Lane. On arriving at number two, he knocked gently at the door, but received no answer for some time. "Why, this is the house that has been empty so long! I didn't know any one had taken it. Where did they get their furniture?" Another knock produced a motion within; a step sounded in the passage, and an old lady opened the door. She seemed astonished at the lateness of the visit. "I was just going to bed," she said, "and only sat up to let in my nephew. He is longer of coming in than he said."

"He'll be here immediately," replied Mr. Benson, "and in the meantime has presented you with this very handsome piece of furniture. He has paid for it—all except the porterage—and the solid oak is no joke to carry on a night like this."

"If my nephew was here," said the old lady, "I would ask you to come in; but, I'm a lone woman, and it wouldn't be proper—there's sixpence for the carriage, and I'm greatly obliged to the dear boy. He's always so thoughtful of his poor old aunt."

"Pray, ma'am, have you been long in this cottage?" inquired Mr. Benson; "and may I ask you where the furniture came from?"

"My nephew took the house for me three days ago. Some of the furniture came by the canal—and the rest we hope will arrive to-morrow."

"If you require any additional articles, you will find the best qualities and lowest prices at my shop," said Mr. Benson, putting the poor woman's sixpence into his pocket, and resuming his homeward way. "I don't like this," he said, as he splashed up the High Street. "There's something curious about that old woman. Why did she give me a whole sixpence?—looking so wretchedly poor, too? And why did she seem so delighted to lay hands on the wardrobe? I'm sorry I let it go at thirty shillings. The young fool would have given me double the money—but I'm always so soft-hearted. I shall never be rich—but what of that? Wealth is not happiness. Amen!"

He extinguished the flaring lamp at the front of his premises; removed the table and all that it contained within the door, turned the key on the inside, and drawing out from a secret drawer a bottle of gin, and, lifting a kettle from the fire which had hitherto glowed unseen behind a set of window curtains hung over the model of a suspension bridge, he proceeded to concoct a pretty strong tumbler, which he applied to his lips with the self-satisfied air of a man who felt that he had deserved some relaxation and enjoyment, after the labors of a well-spent day. A pipe, also, soon added its perfume to the happiness of the position, and Mr. Benson sat like a great Indian idol, inhaling the incense of his gin and tobacco, blandly smiling as the smoke curled in gray wreaths round the bowl of his long clay, and occasionally sipping the comfortable potation before him. The clocks, which had either been sent to him in pledge, or were arranged on different brackets for sale, kept up a miscellaneous concert of hours from one o'clock to twelve—for they were not by any means particular in their notions either of time or tune; but, as a majority of them seemed to be of opinion it was getting near midnight, the contemplative proprietor lighted one more pipe, poured forth one other libation, and carefully locked away the now half-empty bottle in the sanctum devoted to its custody.

He watched once more the curls of his smoke; but fancy was at work, and aided the wreaths as they rose, twisting them into excellent chests of drawers, or handsome mahogany sideboards, on which he expected enormous profits; into little cottages they expanded themselves, which he felt sure he could buy for very little money; then, as the candle began to burn less clearly, he saw one of the large puffs, which he traced with more than usual attention, convert itself into a bed in a dingy little apartment, and through the half-drawn curtains he saw the emaciated countenance of a dying man. The fire uttered a little sound at this moment, as the coals collapsed to the bottom of the grate, and he thought the noise it made formed itself into words from the old man's lips: "I lent him the money, George—two hundred and thirty pounds. I have lost the note of hand; but if he doesn't pay it he is a villain, and will repent it when the hour comes on him as it does on me now."

"Nonsense! folly! madness!" cried Mr. Benson, pushing back his chair, and hurrying the tumbler to his lips. "Would the man have me give money to every person that chose to say that he had lent it, with nothing to shew for it but a white-faced dying old ———. Ha!—a carriage at my door!—a knocking!—who can it be? Some one in distress—come to arrange about pawning the family plate; a countess, perhaps, to pledge the family jewels—coming, coming!" He opened the door and peeped out through the falling rain. A carriage, covered with mud and dripping with wet, was at the curb-stone. The driver let down the steps and a lady tript lightly across the sloppy pavement, and entered the shop. "The carriage will wait," she said; "turn the key and double lock—for I have something of importance to say you." Mr. Benson said nothing, but went up the narrow gangway with the flickering candle in his hand, followed by his visitor. He set down the light, and looked carefully into the woman's face. It was flushed and excited; the eyes flashed with great brilliancy, and her lips quivered with agitation—a tall, masculine woman, plainly dressed, and evidently under the influence of some strong feeling.

"You are Mr. Benson, the pawnbroker?" she said.

"I am; and dealer in second-hand furniture, books, statues, and miscellaneous articles, clocks, watches, wearing apparel, and double-barrel guns."

"You attended the sale at Farmer Merriwood's last Wednesday?"

"I did."

"Did you buy it?"

"What?"

"I forgot. I haven't told you. I won't tell you. What did you pay for all the articles you bought at Cecil Green, at Farmer Merriwood's.

"I got tolerable bargains, ma'am; I don't deny that—the family all dispersed—no near relations. I paid for all I had there a matter of fifteen, or, perhaps, twenty pounds."

"Will you make me out a list of them?—transfer them at once to me?—and I will give you two hundred across the table."

Mr. Benson looked at the woman as she spoke.

"No, madam," he said, "two hundred's too little. If it's worth two hundred to you, it's worth a deal more to me."

"We won't fight about that. What did you buy?—beds, sofas, drawers—let me see the list."

He took from the wire that hung from the cross-bar of his desk the auctioneer's account.

The woman gazed at it; and on coming near the end started. "Yes," she said, "here it is. What do you ask for all? But tush! I want nothing but one small article. Keep the rest of the trash. Give me the oak wardrobe with the four drawers in it, and I will give you what you demand. Come!"

"I can't," said Mr. Benson, turning pale, and trembling with agitation. "It's gone—sold—delivered—lost."

"Fool!" cried the woman. "You have ruined me and yourself. That wardrobe would have enriched us both. Why did the villains not advertise the sale? I would come to it if I had been dying. Can you recover it? Who bought it? Will money tempt them to sell it again? Tell me the name of the purchaser, and I will get possession of it yet."

"I don't remember the name of the person. I think it was a clergyman's wife from Ipswich—or, no. I think it was a Liverpool gentleman who was going out to America: but if he's not sailed it might be possible—I don't say it would—to recover the furniture still."

"Give me his address. I will go to Liverpool myself—to America—anywhere."

"It may, perhaps, be got back without so much trouble," said Mr. Benson, after a pause. "But why are you so very curious about a common chest of drawers? I examined it very carefully, I assure you; they are nothing but ordinary oak—no secret recesses—no hidden springs; there's surely some mistake about it."

"There's no mistake. Did you take out the drawers when you made your examination? Did you turn the top one upside down? Did you see that the bottom was thick and heavy, that it was double? That it might contain documents, notes, a will, receipts, acknowledgements?"

"No, I didn't turn it out. I'm an unsuspicious, innocent man—grossly imposed on—ruined. Amen!"

The pawnbroker seemed so overcome, that the woman was melted. "Hear what I tell you," she said. "If we arrange matters together, we may yet be rich. Do I understand that you will share with me whatever the drawer contains?"

"What does it contain?" inquired Benson in a whisper. "Does it contain anything?"

"Why do I offer you hundreds for it?" inquired the woman, "but I will tell you all. Did you know Farmer Merriwood?"

"No, I can't say I knew him. I once sold him a second-hand saddle; and he made some row about the stuffing coming out. I had to let him off for half the price agreed on."

"It's like him—harsh, cold, selfish—so I was told, in his latter years. He was very different long ago—very different."

"I didn't know him then," replied Mr. Benson.

"I did," continued the woman; "but no wonder he changed; for misery was in his heart, and disgrace fell on his family. These things change a man's temper."

"He was well to do in the world," said the pawnbroker; "churchwarden and highway commissioner. I never heard of any disgrace."

"Some people didn't think so. He had a daughter: twenty years ago people called her beautiful. She was his only child. She was beautiful, at all events, to him. Her name was Caroline. How she loved him! how she attended to all his wishes, and read to him, and played on the piano to him, and was everything to him, and so playful, and so kind! We all loved her."

"Did you know her?"

"Did I know her? I knew her from the time of her birth. I was a distant relation. Cousin Janet they called me, though I was their paid servant: but the word cousin was better than all their wages. So we went on for years and years, I taking care of the house; Philip Merriwood attending to the farm, and Caroline, the delight of us both. Don't you see what's coming, old man? You must be dull as this room you live in, if you don't guess what followed."

"I can't," said Mr. Benson. "I'm trying. I can't. Amen!"

"Not when I tell you that the Marquis of ———, but never mind his name, it is best, perhaps, omitted; but he had a son—his eldest son, Lord Rostock—dashing, gay, but kind; oh, kind and generous like a knight of old; he saw her, saw Caroline; was struck with her beauty—who wasn't?—got to speech of her, spoke her fair, won her heart: the old story—the old story! Love rules all. Hearts break; but fools fill up the places of those who perish. Ah! once—'twas in September, twelve years ago—she came to me and said, 'Cousin Janet, do you think my father a forgiving man?' 'Of course, my darling,' I said. 'He is a Christian.' 'But will he forgive a person for getting above him in the world, for leaving the rank he moves in? Ha, ha?' she added with a beautiful, wild laugh. 'What would he think if he had to stand with his hat off as he saw me going up the church path, and asked how my ladyship was? Wouldn't it be charming to be a lady?' I told her no, or turned the talk, or gave her wise advice. I forget what I did; it was so pretty to see her walking up and down the floor of her bedroom, flirting one of her slippers as if it were a fan, and swaying about from side to side as if she had a court train to her robe. And all the time she was only in her night-gown, and showed her pretty naked feet."

"And what happened? Cold, eh? consumption?"

"No—elopement—ruin—death! She was missing one morning that same month, and Philip Merriwood never held up his head. He seemed to know what happened without being told. He never asked for her, and when a letter was put in his hands a few days after, signed by Caroline, and telling him that she was about to be married—to be a lady, rich and grand—but kind still, and loving to him, he tore the paper into twenty pieces, and said 'fool, fool!'"

"And so she was," said Mr. Benson. "He didn't marry her?"

"No, and she never wrote again. So the house was dark and dismal; Philip Merriwood went into the bedroom that had been hers, and seized the little oak wardrobe where she had kept her clothes. He emptied the drawers on the floor, and ordered me to remove the frocks and stockings, and the blue silk jacket, and the pink satin slip, and all the things, and throw them into the fire. It was an old piece of furniture, and had belonged to his people for hundreds of years. It had once been the place where he had kept his secret papers; his leases and bonds and parchments were all in the front drawer, but in the top one there was a false bottom; there—in the thickness of the wood—he kept the things he cherished most: the letters that had past between him and Sophia Feltou, his wife, before they were married; the last letter she wrote to him when she was dying; the first copy-book of Caroline when she was learning to write; the little notes she sent him when she was at school. So, when he had turned all Caroline's clothes out of the drawers, he opened the secret ledge; and now he read, and cried, and read again! We couldn't get him down to dinner, and when he came he ate nothing. A month passed, and a long time passed, and when half a year was come and gone, there came a letter one day with a great crest upon the seal—a marquis's crest, they call it—and when it was opened Farmer Merriwood saw it was from the young Lord Rostock, whose father had just died and left him all the estates. Caroline, he said, was provided for, and happy; but as he felt that he owed some reparation to the father, he enclosed him a Bank of England note for a thousand pounds."

"Bless me; what a generous nobleman," exclaimed the pawnbroker. "She must have been a cunning gipsey—what a fortunate man Farmer Merriwood was!"

"How he trembled as he held out the thin piece of paper, his lips moving evidently with curses on them, but no sound being heard. 'Cousin Janet,' he said at last, 'come with me upstairs; you shall witness what I do.' We went up, and to my surprise he went into what had been Caroline's bedroom. 'This is a thousand pound note,' he said, 'which that ruffian thinks will reconcile me to shame. I won't touch it, and I won't let him have it back, to employ it perhaps in tempting some one else. If the girl he took away from me is ever in want, you will know where to find money for her support. It shall lie beside all other things that remind me of her behavior. No one shall touch it till I die.' And so saying he pulled out the secret drawer at the top, and laid the note lengthways on its back, and shut it up with a bang, and gave me the silver pin that touches the spring. From that hour no one has ever opened it, and there it lies, with the printed face upwards, a bank-note for a thousand pounds."

"And I sold it for thirty shillings!" shrieked Mr. Benson, "to a miserable old woman—a ruined man! I've lost a thousand pounds. The young man was too much for me. I hated him from the first; but vengeance will pursue him for his iniquity. Amen!"

"And why was the sale so hurried?" continued Cousin Janet. "I left Cecil Green six years since, but I have kept the spring-opener carefully—carefully. I heard he was ill; he wrote to me that he did not expect to live long, and that all was as he had left it in the drawer. I couldn't get up from Yorkshire for some days. In the meantime he died, and was buried, and the furniture sold, and the money lost. Go, give what sum you like, but get me back that wardrobe, and we shall divide the money."

"Equally?" exclaimed Mr. Benson, starting up; "where is that silver pin? Give it me—it is not too late to make the attempt to-night."

"Oh yes, it is though," said the woman. I'll keep the key. What you have to do is to recover the wardrobe; or, if you will tell me the purchaser's address ———"

"No, no; I'll keep that to myself," replied the pawnbrokor with a cunning look. "We'll open it in presence of each other."

"I will be here at nine to-morrow morning," said Cousin Janet. "We understand the arrangement; it's getting on for one o'clock—good night." So saying she slipt along the gangway, and got once more into the carriage.

"What a fool to think a drawer can't be opened with a hatchet in the absence of a silver pin!" said Benson. "Amen! Good night."

The rain continued all the night through. Mr. Benson heard it as he lay awake flooding on roof and garret window. As the dawn began to force its way through the watery air, he sprang up and put on his clothes. Rapidly he pursued his way to number two, Abbeyfield Lane, and standing before the door felt in his pockets that the roleaux of golden sovereigns were safe, for he fancied the sight of the yellow metal would have more effect than a mere promise to pay, or even a roll of notes. They were all right—three of a hundred pounds each. He knocked. "Is Mrs. Truman down stairs yet?" he asked through the key-hole. There was no answer, but in a short time he heard the rap of a small hammer. He knocked louder: and the rat, tat, tat of the hammer ceased. The door was opened. The person who opened it was Mrs. Truman's nephew.

"Hallo!" he said, "who expected to see you at such an early hour?"

"Business, my dear sir. I find I made a little mistake last night. I sent your dear aunt the wrong article. I hope the old lady is well."

"Yes, she's very well," said the nephew, "a little tired with sitting up so late, but delighted with the wardrobe, I assure you. I was just trying to fit the drawers a little closer. The top one seems loose."

"I find the want of it destroys the set," said Mr. Benson; "would you do me the favor to give it back to me? I will replace it with the best article in my shop."

"By no means," replied the youth. "I haven't had time to rummage it over, yet. I told you fortunes were sometimes found in old family furniture."

There was a long pause; Mr. Benson was forming his calculations. He recommenced the conversation in a whisper, urged his plea with all the eloquence in his power; and finally, was again seen proceeding through the falling rain with the richly endowed wardrobe on his back. Hurriedly trotting up the High Street he dashed into his shop, set his burden on the ground, tore the top drawer out upon the floor, and saw a small piece of paper pasted on the back. Was it the thousand pound note? He rubbed his eyes—he looked closer—and he read the following words: "Quits. George Evans."

"Not a bad stock in trade," said the young gentleman whom we encountered at the beginning of this story, Aunt Truman and Cousin Janet all at once, as he (for George Evens, the young actor, had played all three parts) replaced certain articles of female apparel in his trunk in the little bedroom of the Pigeon's Arms. "There goes in my aunt's little black mantle. There goes in Cousin Janet's crumpled bonnet. When I have paid for the hire of the cottage in Abbeyfield Lane, and the carriage, and the wardrobe, and the sixpence to old Benson for bringing it down, I think it will leave that old ruffian's conscience clear, for he will exactly have paid me the two hundred and thirty pounds he borrowed from my father, with interest for nine years."

Somewhat Vague.—"A few years ago, in Ohio, there lived on a small stream called 'Duck Creek' a local preacher of the Methodist Church, by the name of Jacob Smith. His educational advantages had been somewhat slender; so that often in his preaching he 'murdered the King's English' by wholesale. On one occasion he was preaching in his own neighborhood, in 'Smith's Meeting-house.' During the sermon some of the young Smiths indulged in bad behavior. He paused, drew himself up to his full height, and pointing his long, hard finger at them, exclaimed, "'What! will you cut up here in Smith's old meetin'-house, when there lies your grandmother (pointing through the window to the grave-yard,) what is the offspring of us all?'"

Mr. Charles Reade says: "No man nor woman is safe who has once formed the habit of looking to drink for solace, or cheerfulness, or comfort. While the world goes well, they will likely be temperate; but the habit is built, the railroad to destruction is cut ready for use, the rails are laid down the station houses erected, and the train is on the line waiting only for the locomotive; it comes to us; it grapples us, and away we go in a moment, down the line we have been constructing, like a flash of lightning, to destruction."

Whooping Cough is very prevalent among children in this city. It has been ascertained that the inhalation of the gases which abound in the "purifying room" of gas works is an excellent remedy for whooping cough. A number of children afflicted with this disease have been benefited and cured by the treatment referred to.—Sacramento Bee.

It used to be an interesting problem, we remember, in school, for the boys to cipher out the British national debt, in pounds weight and how far it would extend in dollars. They are turning the multiplication tables on us now in Canada, and our debt forms a theme for mathematical dissertation and experiment.

The most extraordinary instance of patience on record, in modern times, is that of an Illinois Judge, who listened silently for two days while a couple of wordy attorneys contended about the construction of an act of the Legislature, and then ended the controversy by quietly remarking: "Gentlemen, the law is repealed."

An "International Polyglot Travelling Institution," young gentlemen of all nations admitted, which "will be continually travelling under the superintendence of a superior person," is announced in Europe. As it is to be continually travelling, we think it might with more propriety be called a "Polliwog" Institute.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday, Mlle. Felicita de Vestvali made her first appearance at Maguire's Opera House, assuming the character of "Angelo," in the drama of Romanio, the Beautiful Demon. The house was densely crowded, every foot of standing room being occupied. When the magnificent figure of Vestvali appeared, bounding down the rocky pathway at the back part of the stage, a storm of applause burst from the audience, and a shower of floral tributes to beauty fell at her feet. Romanio, the Beautiful Demon, does not differ essentially from Bet Demonio. We do not think Mlle. Vestvali made a very judicious choice when she selected the character of "Angelo" in which to make her first appearance; we are sure she must have others in her repertory in which she will appear to far greater advantage. Near the close of the third act an opportunity is afforded for the display of the wonderful power which Mlle. Vestvali possesses; here her magnificent voice, beyond dispute the finest ever heard on the stage of the Opera House, rang through the theatre, positively electrifying the audience; in this scene, voice, attitude, gestures, and elocution, all showed the actress; but it was the only single opportunity afforded during the whole play. The play was beautifully put on the stage, with new scenery and costumes. The music was perfectly delightful; it is always good, but Mr. Tony Reiff, who assumed the directorship of the orchestra, gave on this occasion several new overtures in admirable style. Mrs. Sophie Edwin never played better than she did in the character of "Lizanetta;" that Mrs. Sophie Edwin's best is very good, all are aware. The "Cardinal Montalto" of Mr. Walter Leman was a very careful and good piece of acting. Mr. Charles Thorne, who since his return from China has played every part he has undertaken with a neatness and finish which did not characterize his performance a year or two ago, played the character of "Ranovio" capitally. General favorite as Mr. Frank Mayo was, I have never once heard his loss regretted since Mr. Thorne rejoined the Opera House Company; leading parts receive full justice at his hands. Romanio was well played, throughout. Mlle. Vestvali sang two songs—"Brave Marco," and "You are the Star." As the part of "Angelo" did not afford sufficient scope for the display of Mlle. Vestvali's talent as an actress, so most certainly were these songs illy-calculated to display the beauties of her glorious contralto voice. The public of San Francisco have neither seen nor heard Vestvali, the magnificent, as yet. When I have witnessed her impersonation of "Henri Lagadere," in the Duke's Motto, and heard her sing songs that have music in them, I will attempt to criticise her acting and singing, but until then will refrain from doing more than simply stating I have found no reason to change the opinion which I expressed in my last, that Vestvali has a magnificent figure and stage presence, a splendid voice, and considerable spirit and animation. THE CALIFORNIAN going to press on Friday evening, I must defer my notice of Mlle. Vestvali's performance of the character of "Gamea" until next week. As in this character she sings five songs, a fair opinion of her abilities as a vocalist can no doubt be gained. This piece—in which I fancy Mlle. Vestvali will slightly astonish those who have formed their conception of the character of "Gamea" from witnessing the "World-Renowned's" impersonation of it—will be played this evening, and there will, beyond a peradventure, be a crowded house to witness the stately Vestvali's first assumption of a female part.

At Wheatleigh's Eureka, during the early part of the week, Bel Demonio; or, the Beautiful Demon, held the stage. Mr. Wheatleigh's impersonation of "Cardinal Montalto" is a splendid piece of acting. Why does not Mr. Wheatleigh give us another Cardinal—"Richelieu?" We have seen none better than his would be. Mr. Shiels made a good deal out of the part of "Rannuccio," playing it broadly and effectively. Miss Clarkson played the part of "Marguerita" with such animation that she actually drew a round of applause from the audience, who forgot for the instant that she had only been about six months on the stage, and therefore ought not to be applauded, however well she might act. Mr. J. H. Warwick's rendering of the part of "Angelo" drew considerable applause. On Wednesday, Mr. Wheatleigh was the recipient of a benefit, tendered him by the company. He had a capital house, and gave those who attended a capital evening's entertainment and a neat little speech. The performance commenced with Thomas Morton's old English comedy of A Cure for the Heartache. This is amusing enough, but it would be absurd to compare this "standard play" with such a comedy as Tom Taylor's Ticket-of-Leave Man, or others by the same pen. The Bulletin regrets that such comedies as A Cure for the Heartache should be driven off the stage by sensational novelties. It is all nonsense to regret that dramas which picture a past age and obsolete manners and customs do not possess much interest for the present generation. Tom Taylor can beat Thomas Morton out of sight in play-writing. Mr. Wheatleigh, in this comedy, was very amusing as "Young Rapid," a character which suited him capitally, while Mr. Shiels caused many a laugh by his "Old Rapid," in which character he was equally as much at home. Miss Rose Forrest, an actress recently from Australia, made her first appearance in California as "Miss Vortex," in this comedy. Miss Forrest possesses considerable comedy talent, and acts with great animation; she is evidently no tyro in the dramatic profession, but understands the business of the stage to perfection. She is a most acceptable addition to the Eureka company. Mr. H. D. Thompson, in every part which he undertakes, displays a versatility and talent of a high order. His "Frank Oatland," in the comedy, was a perfect study of a "countryman;" his dialect was extremely good. Miss Belle Divine, as the heart-broken "Jessie Oatland," appeared quite to enjoy being miserable, and did it so naturally that she left nothing to be desired. On the conclusion of the comedy, Mr. Wheatleigh, in response to a unanimous call, made a little speech, in which he told the audience he had leased the Metropolitan Theatre, where, in the course of a week or two, he would produce Arrah-na-Pogue in a style hitherto unattempted; that he was getting on swimmingly and was not half tired of being a manager, and expected, as he had been able to get through the Fair, opera and circus season, he would be able to keep going with ease as long as he liked, at which the audience did rejoice exceedingly. Mrs. Georgiana Leach sang "Auld Robin Gray," and received a unanimous encore, which she responded to by singing "I Dreamt that I Dwelt in Marble Halls" with much sweetness and feeling. Mr. Allen's novel performance on his "musical gridiron" was really charming, far more musical than that on a tin whistle, which he gave on being encored. The performance concluded with the Jubilee House. Last night the Colleen Bawn was admirably performed. Mr. Wheatleigh's double impersonation of "Myles-na-Coppaleen" and "Danny Mann," is a splendid piece of acting, as all are aware. The herome is capitally played by Miss Clarkson. Mr. Warwick, though a little too noisy, as usual, played "Hardress Cregan" passably well. Miss Belle Divine is unsuited to such characters as that of "Ann Chute," but did well—considering. Miss Forrest, whose talent lies especially in old woman roles, was very good as "Shelah," and Mr. H. D. Thompson, whose versatility is really wonderful, played "Corrigan" splendidly. This play will be repeated for the last time to-night. The performance will conclude with Jubilee House, in which Mrs. Yeamans brings down the house in tumultuous applause by her wonderfully funny impersonation of "Waddilove." This amusing little comedy, with A Cure for the Heartache, will form the afternoon's performance for ladies and children. The preparations for the production of Arrah-na-Pogue are progressing steadily, and it will probably in the course of a couple of weeks be produced. Mrs. Sedley Brown, a popular actress late of the Boston Museum, arrived by last steamer to support Mr. Wheatleigh in this play. Mr. George Pauncefort has also been engaged by Mr. Wheatleigh to appear in this play, which will be produced with entirely new scenic effects and an immensely strong cast.

The performances at the Circus are rapidly drawing to a close. During the coming week, Ella Zoyara, the most daring rider in the ring, and Mr. Wilson, the manager, will be the recipients of benefits. After this the company will go to Sacramento, to perform during Fair time, and, returning here, proceed at once to Australia, via the Sandwich Islands.

TOUCHSTONE.

FOREIGN MUSICAL ITEMS.

A GERMAN paper, speaking of the great robber Tristany, in Southern Italy, asks whether it would not be good to provide him with an "Isolde." If this was done, the paper says, he could be caught easily at a love scene, which in Tristan and Isolde never takes less than an hour and a-half.

THE celebrated amateur, Prince Galitzin, is conducting concerts in Moscow, the programme of which reminds us of that happy time of our youth, which never will return.

LUCY ESCOTT, Miss Durand, and Mr. Squires, are still in Australia, and perform Faust and the Huguenots, after a fashion; the orchestra there being adapted and probably thoroughly "revised" by the conductor of the very weak band, a German homo novus, by the name of Siede.

THE theatre in Breslau was burnt down by an accidental fire. The loss will be about $150,000.

PRIVY COUNCILLOR BITTER of Mannheim, Germany, has written a book, Sebastian Bach and his Time.

The Flying Dutchman was performed in Munich, Hans von Buelow conducting. The king had come from his summer residence to attend the performance. At the close of the second act the composer was called, but not being in the house, he could not appear. Kindermann sang "the Dutchman," and Miss Stehle the part of "Senta."

IN Bockenheim, near Frankfort-on-the-Main, the proprietor of a "café chantant" has engaged a female ballet troupe, which performs twice a day to large audiences composed for the greater part of elderly gentlemen.

ULLMANN has engaged Vientemps, David, Piatti, Jaell and Carlotta Patti for Berlin.

AN opinion of great value about the Africaine has been rendered by the conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, Chapelmaster Dorn, who has seen it in Paris. He acknowledges the beauties of the work, but says that the performance, compared to that of Tristan and Isolde, in Munich, was like a merry children's symphony à la Haydn. He also says that Hans von Buelow's conducting the latter opera by heart without the score was a most colossal effort of memory, even surpassing that of Mendelssohn.

A terrible blow has been struck to the hopes of Richard Wagner by the death of the famous tenor Schnorr von Carolsfeld, who sang Tristan in Munich, and was engaged to sing the same part in Carlsruhe. The very great nervous excitement, which Mr. Schnoor had suffered, suddenly brought on a typhoid fever, which terminated the existence of the young and hopeful artist.

LISZT seems to be weary of the atmosphere at Rome, and has gone to Paris—it is said, to play the piano at a concert on behalf of a Roman charity. Nothing more sensational, and likely to take, could have been thought of.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.

THE STATE FAIR will open its exhibition on Monday next at Sacramento. The great race between Norfolk and Lodi will also come off there on Monday. This will be the most exciting contest the turf of this State has ever beheld. The California Steam Navigation Company will despatch the Chrysopolis from Vallejo street wharf to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, for the accomodation of those who intend visiting the Fair or seeing the race. The tickets for the round trip are placed at six dollars, with the privilege of returning at any time on any of the Company's boats.

A HAWAAIIAN ORATOR.—The 31st day of July was suitably celebrated in Honolulu, being the twenty-second anniversary of the restoration of the Hawaaiian Flag in 1843, which had been wrongfully lowered by a British commander, whose act was afterward disowned by the English Government. The late anniversary was marked by an able address in English from a native orator, the Hon D. Kalakana, which is given at length in the Hawaaiian Gazette.

BŒOTIANISM IN PARIS.

"SPIRIDION" in the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, says: "I wish you could hear these people moan over the cross of the Legion of Honor bestowed on Mlle. Rosa Bonheur. I was taken by the button yesterday: 'Can you conceive,' said my fatiguer, 'how it is possible the government should have thought of giving the decoration to a woman—and to a woman who has done nothing but paint stupid animals? The Legion of Honor was instituted for soldiers who pour out their blood for their country. Who will care for the cross now that it has been given to a woman?' Hot as the weather, my temper was hotter, so I replied: 'Mlle. Rosa Bonheur is not the first woman decorated; the cross has been given to Sisters of Charity and to cantiniéres (and Heaven only knows what claim the cantiniéres, generally the wife of the whole regiment to which they are attached, have to belong to any legion of honor,) therefore Mlle. Rosa Bonheur may be considered an eligible candidate; the mere fact of her wearing a petticoat ought not to bar her out. As to painting stupid animals, that ought to be no objection; for one sees every day painters decorated who do nothing but paint stupid blackguards whom they style Moses or Isaac or St. James or St. John (for you know as well as I do of what stuff the models are made:) and she by painting stupid animals carries France's name and increases France's reputation wherever men take interest in art. Horace Vernet did more for France's reputation than one in a thousand of the statesmen, generals, and diplomatists who have appeared in France the last forty years. The painter speaks an universal language, which is intelligible to the meanest hind that, following plough-tail, never raised his eyes above the furrow he traced, and to the most airy soul ever borne on the wings of art to the loftiest regions of the sublime and the beautiful. This language Mlle. Rosa Bonheur speaks, and whenever she utters it 'tis accompanied by a hymn to France and French genius.' Of course I did not convince my fatiguer; there are brains thicker than the rhinoceros's hide, and as it, while resisting a musket ball, absorbs water and air through pores, so those brains which reason's powerful shafts cannot penetrate, constantly absorb all the nonsense, prejudice, and stupidity which may be floating in the atmosphere which surrounds them.

"Since I am recording their drivel let me repeat to you a remark I overheard at the last Exhibition of the Fine Arts. Mons. Moreau, a sculptor of merit, and who gave promise of something more, died soon after the opening of the exhibition. Pious hands placed a wreath of yellow amaranths (which are called here immortelles from the persisteney of their color) on the pedestal of the statue he contributed to the show. It was an admirable statue of Aristophanes; the head given us by the Greek art was retained, but the lines of sarcasm and raillery were exaggerated—our senses are not so delicate as the Athenians. A cit and his son stood gazing on the marble; his boy asked: 'Father why is that wreath hung at the feet of this stone gentleman?' The father replied: 'My dear child why do you ask this question? Don't you see why the wreath was placed there? This gentleman has died since the exhibition opened, and some relation has placed the wreath there to attest his eternal grief at losing a tenderly loved kinsman.'

"It is astonishing into what high places these Bœotians have crawled: the clerks of the Legion of Honor recently refused to allow Faure the singer to wear in his button-hole the bit of ribbon—the Order of Isabella—which the Queen of Spain gave him t'other day for singing in her presence. An opera singer with a ribbon in his button-hole. Fie! Out upon it! He appealed to Marshal Valliant, who, as Minister of the Emperor's Household, is the patron of everybody connected with the imperial theatres. The Marshal replied: 'Pshaw! Wear it. I'll make them give you permission!' I said it is astonishing into what high places these Bœotians do crawl! It is not astonishing at all: as a mixture of a lie doth ever give pleasure, so a certain quantity of stupidity increases the rapidity and certainty of success. The reason of this is explained by Nadir in his last work. He says he was walking in the street when he saw a workman let fall a sponge from the ladder on which he was working. He called to his comrade at the ladder's foot to throw it up to him. The comrade picked it up, steeped it in the water which flowed by the curbstone and then it being sufficiently heavy to ensure its pursuing a straight trajectory, threw it up to him. So it is with men when they are sufficiently heavy (weight often attained by extrinsic and sometimes by ignoble circumstances,) they bolt straight to success. Do not think Nadir applies this street sight to explain social phenomena. He turns it to the demonstration of his theory that vessels to navigate the air must be heavier than the air. These Bœotians spare nothing! Here is the inscription one of them placed upon his wife or mother; please do not add any punctuation, for there is none on the tombstone: 'Here sleepeth justly regretted Mrs. Catherine Claire Hoirot wife of Mous. Sebastian Plumerel. This lady was born for trade at the age of 19 years before her marriage she managed the cloth business unaided a short time afterwards she united all the other branches which did not cease except with her life her business engrossed her day and night. Her desires to acquire by her conduct everybody's esteem and confidence her life was courageous in her voyage pertinacious in her enterprise bold in her purchase but sensible to the aggravating circumstances which abridged her day and ended her career the 6 June 1822 aged 60 years without having made a slip in her life.' This epitaph might, but for the date, have been written by the wife of the Marshal de la Meillerage, who was a Mlle. de Cossé and pretended to be descended through the Cossar of Naples, from Coeceius Nerva, the Roman Emperor, and through him from Julius Cæsar. One evening while Corneille's tragedy, the Death of Pompey, was played, she was observed to sob bitterly. Her friends sent to inquire the cause of her tears: 'I am weeping to think of my poor uncle's hard fate.'"

JERUSALEM PONIES.

THE clever authoress of Adam Bede has, by the mouth of the plain spoken Mrs. Poyser, laid it down that it is no use "dressing up fine to sit backwards on a donkey." In this somewhat ex parte statement two ideas are expressed: first, that to sit backwards on a quadruped is not consonant with loftiness of position; and, second, that a donkey is an inferior animal, not to be mounted in full dress. The donkey has somehow achieved a bad name, or at least a name for lowliness and stupidity. When we want to find a bridge for fools to stumble over, we refer to the Pons Asinorum; when we desire to express our thorough contempt for a man we call him a donkey; and any measure or proceeding of a completely senseless character we brand as "asinine." And yet the donkey is not so sorry an animal after all. When he browses upon thistles—a food he is supposed to be fond of—he does not expect to find figs growing on the Scottish emblem; and when, in his humility, he feeds upon haybands, who shall say that he is deceived into the belief that they are more delicate provender? We may depend upon it that the donkey is not so bad as he seems, nor so stupid as he is represented, and beneath those long ears and that stolid brow there is more sound sense (of the animal kind) than donkey decryers give him credit for. But the world has always ill-treated the donkey. To whisper that Midas had asses' ears was a cutting piece of satire; to represent Bottom the Weaver as a donkey beloved of Titania was one of Shakspeare's most telling conceits. Sterne weeping over the dead donkey, is generally thought to have been an ass himself; while of "gentle Coleridge's" attempts in that way Byron writes—

> "Yet none in lofty numbers can surpass
> The bard who soars to eulogise an ass;
> So well the subject suits his noble mind,
> He brays, the laureate of the long-eared kind."

Thus has the donkey suffered from the shafts of wit and the ill-nature of critics; and because he is lowly and makes a dissonant noise when it pleases him to be vocal; because his tail is a switch and his ears are large, and his eyes melancholy, and he is chiefly used in England by costermongers, the donkey has fallen to the very lowest place in the category of beasts of burden. If we give a dog a bad name, we are told we may as well hang him, but for centuries we have put affronts upon the donkey without adopting the sus. per coll. process, and doing away with the poor beast that we deride. So small, indeed, do we reckon this useful creature, that he is not even taxed. He has never entered Mr. Gladstone's head, and while the revenue is recruited by a tax upon dogs, and a heavy impost upon horses, so contemptuously is the donkey treated that he has no place in the schedules. Thus we drive the donkey into poor latitudes. The man who has a donkey that won't go, feels that he has an untaxed donkey—at least an animal that may be kept for the bare cost of his subsistence, and one that has no representation without taxation. The same indifference or ill-favor that attends the donkey when living waits upon, or neglects him when dead. The defunct donkey escapes the public eye, and to have seen such a thing is thought to have been a very uncommon experience indeed. Some other animals we eat when their allotted time of life has expired; but the donkey, at least as far as we know, never comes to table, even in an age when horseflesh is thought to be good food, and jerked beef or "charqui" struggles into notice at threepence a pound. Delicate persons and young children are, it is true, fed with asses' milk; but the supply is dealt out sub rosá, and the strictest privacy is always observed at milking time. In short, the donkey is a tabooed and neglected animal.

But this is an age of progress, even for donkeys, and the long-derided beasts are going with the times. A gentleman who has done much toward giving the metropolis drinking fountains, and a benevolent lady who is always giving something for some purpose or other, conceived that they might ameliorate the condition of the donkey by showing that with good treatment he is a lively and well-shaped animal enough, and able to arouse admiration instead of exciting contempt. Impressed with this idea, Miss Burdett Coutts and Mr. Samuel Gurney, taking other philanthropists to their councils, established what at first seemed a very curious kind of exhibition—a Mule and Donkey Show. The dog has his day, the horse has become an annual exhibitioner, and our flocks and herds send representatives to Islington. Why not the donkey? The thing was tried, and was so far a success as to justify repetition. During the last few days donkeys have been the great attraction of Islington, and not without reason, for this curious show places the donkey in a new light, and acts as a warning to evil-minded costermongers. The lesson of the exhibition is plain enough: "The worst use you can put a donkey to is to beat him." The prize animals shown at the Agricultural Hall we must suppose to have passed lives of perfect peace. Show them a stick—the utmost liberty allowed with that weapon in the arena—and they neither wince nor depress their ears, nor adopt the ultima ratio of all donkeys: a hostile demonstration with the heels. Plainly, they don't understand the use of a stick; for their masters have learnt that persuasion is better than force, and that untanned hides are more valuable than scored backs. A goodly number of prizes of small amount tempted a fair show this year, but we shall chiefly confine our selections to the class of animal which the donkey-show is especially instituted to protect and improve. This class comprises the costermongers' donkeys: the hard-working animals that we see doing duty in the street. Here, unless the judges have made a mistake, we come upon Mr. Napper's Blackey, a donkey that can trot fifteen miles an hour, and that has had his successes in trials of speed. He carried off the first honors in his class, and if he really is used by his owner for obtaining a livelihood in the ordinary business way, he certainly deserved the award. Next we come upon a creature whose description is so curious, that we copy it verbatim et literatim from the owner's placard: "Mr. Beckin's Donkey Tony Better-knowr as yar-mouth. Joe. He has challenge. any. Donkey His Heigh. 39 inches on a Turn-pike Road, For 5 or 10 pounds." A most defiant donkey this; and he and his noted friend Blackey can be taken as representative animals, designed to prove what good stuff may, under favorable conditions, exist beneath asses' shin.

But two items in the list of awards really puzzle us, because we cannot understand how it was possible for the judges to discover which were "the two most intelligent donkeys" in the exhibition. How are we to estimate the intelligence of a donkey? Does it lurk in his eye, or in his ear, or in the nice conduct of his tail, or in his tout ensemble? It is almost inadmissable to suggest that it might manifest itself in his bray, for as yet we have been unable to translate that language into more than augury of wet weather. What did the two donkeys that received prizes for "intelligence" do to deserve their celebrity? How was the competitive examination managed, so that these competitive Wallahs scored the due number of marks! Ah, a light breaks in upon us. They were shown the election speeches of certain Liberal candidates, who have found favor with the constituencies; and they indignantly turned tail and would have none of them. Then they were asked whether they believed in the list of "Liberal gains" compiled by the Radical press; and they manifested like signs of impatience. But the final test was their inability to comprehend the "muzzle" taken off Mr. Gladstone by the University of Oxford. Trotting at a signal, halting at a word, lying down at a wink—these were only minor elements of their intelligence. The highest development of that quality was a thorough disbelief in the "Buncombe" with which Liberalism is trying to bolster up very small successes.—London Paper, 24th July.

THE young American singer, Miss Laura Harris, is causing considerable discussion in the London musical world. Some of the English papers are dissatisfied with the strength and equality of her organ. But critics, like doctors, differ sometimes. Miss Harris appeared lately, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in Mozart's Magic Flute and is thus eulogized by the London Herald: "Miss Laura Harris has one of the most surprising high soprano voices ever heard—higher, perhaps, even than M'lle de Murska's—and her execution, as everybody knows, is facile and brilliant in the extreme. Of course, the music of the "Queen of Night" requires something more, for its interpretation, than the most brilliant vocalization and an unusual command of the upper register of the voice, but these are the first necessities for singing the music, and Miss Laura Harris possesses them in an eminent degree. From one who is still > "On the verge of maidhood life"

the grandeur of style, power, and dramatic energy, which the music imperatively demands, is not to be expected—time and long experience only can supply them; but even these are forcibly indicated in the youthful prima donna's singing, and every one seems to feel that they will come with years. Miss Laura Harris' musical organization is of the highest order. Her instinct for time is true as a die, and her intonation is as just as that of a well-tuned instrument. And, indeed, to sing the two grand airs of the "Queen of Night," in time and tune, is a feat that very few singers have been able to accomplish since Madame Hofen first undertook the part, at Vienna, in 1791. Miss Laura Harris, however, has accomplished that almost impossible feat, and accomplished it with comparative ease. Her singing last night, on both occasions created a furore; and, indeed, we have seldom seen an audience more excited. Both airs were encored in a hurricane of applause, the young artist, at the end, exhibiting no the least symptom of fatigue.

TWO FASHIONABLE DIVINERS.

EVERYBODY knows that the late Countess of Blessington was, in one sense of the word, an enchantress: her wit, her beauty, and her gentle courtesy, bewitched all who came within the Magic Circle of her Charms. It is by no means equally well known, however, that she was a sorceress. The present writer, who "moved" both in the fashionable and literary world during her bright career, confesses that he never so much as heard of her Ladyship as a diviner, although her flatterers would make her out divine: and yet there lies before us a little volume, purchased yesterday, which informs all whom it may concern (and they are counted, we are told, by tens of thousands,) that the fair Countess was a True Interpreter of Dreams and Visions, and Omens of the wedding day; a distinguisher of the false from the true dreams; and an Enabler of persons of both sexes, who are born "seers," to interpret thereby all the Hidden Secrets and Mysteries of the Living and the Dead, with knowledge for mothers on the ruling power and influence of the Twelve Celestial Planets at the nativity of their Children, and the Fate they are born to.

These pregnant words, we hasten to admit, are not our own, but are borrowed from the title-page of the work in question, whereon they figure in a great variety of type, and in enormous capitals. The edition is an illustrated one. A very splendid picture, which "draws out" like Bradshaw's map, exhibits her Ladyship performing incantations in her private Egyptian Temple, in the presence of a select circle of the nobility, and exhibiting her "ever-renowned and never-to-be forgotten Magic Crystal." Nothing can exceed the richness of color which distinguishes both the clothes and the complexions of these distinguished persons, while the well-bred vacuity of their features is admirably maintained, notwithstanding the startling phenomena of which they are witnesses.

I dwell upon the picture, because that and the title-page contain all that the book has to say of "the late learned Countess, the refulgence of whose talents has left a never-to-be-extinguished halo on the literature of our country." After giving her name and her countenance to the publication, she disappears, like a good fairy at a baptism, and we hear nothing more of her. This alone, I think, renders the work exceedingly remarkable. Moreover, independent of the great interest attaching to its general contents, there is the Preface, which is a most extraordinary production, and of itself worth all the money—sixpence—charged for the entire volume. Dexterous as is the escape of the Countess from her own pages, the writer whose mission it is to introduce us to the matters of which they treat, is still more happy in evasion. No lawyer, paid by the "skin," was ever more skilful in lengthening out his parchments; no statesman, speaking against time, ever occupied so much of it with Nothing, as this ingenious writer. Nay, most singular of all, what there is in the Preface is directed against the quackery of superstition—as exemplified in rival works of the same tendency.

"The human mind, fertile in self-deception, accommodates itself with wonderful facility to overcome scruples in deceiving others, or applies a perverse ingenuity to evading all the restrictions of prudence, morality, justice, religion, and sound reason . . . . to be thought more extraordinary or clever than the rest of mankind; and so the whim of dreams, omens, and visions by others, has risen to such a height that it has become to the bulk of mankind a puzzle to distinguish between false and true dreams, and the sham or real interpreters of their meaning. Hence the multitude of Dreamers and Dreamers' Guides offered at a tempting cheap price on every hand." At this point of the preface, as the Alpine climbers say of the small altitudes, "cultivation ceases"—the undoubted cultivation of the writer in the matter of the finest English—and he not only falls off in that particular, but he becomes involved and unintelligible; having made his blow at his enemies, his Preface seems to have no other object than to produce vertigo in its readers.

"The best anatomists and the wisest physiologists, who understand the structure of the organs of the human brain, and their action in connection with the daily health of the bodily organs, influenced by dietetic and atmospheric changes, and the innumerable favorable and unfavorable events that happen in trade, and within the domestic circle, as well as the ordinary physician called in casually to cure our bodily ills—all know that the fluids and solids are depressed or excited accordingly. Here, then, by the most common-sense view of our mental and physical structure, we discern the origin and nature of the illusions of the mind. Billious and phlegmatic persons are much subject to false dreaming, such as monsters surrounded by flame; corpses shewing all manner of contortions, alternately bright and dark, with crowded masses of the most contradictory and impossible things, sometimes mixed up with the well-known faces of esteemed friends and relations concerned in disreputable transactions; falling into rivers and deep holes from some height, and other delusions and monstrocities." The last word is spelt with a c, in order, I suppose, to give it a weired significance. "The judgment and the memory are the arbiters of our dreaming moments! When the judgment is dormant during sleep, the memory becomes but a confused chronicler of events and general affairs. But when the judgment is awake, and the memory sits enthroned by her side in full consciousness, then the perception of men and things, and all worldly events, becomes clear to the mental view. Thus, in the case of Maria Martin, whose mother dreamed of the scene of her murder three times, it may be regarded as a true dream." Conceive how the mind of the credulous maid-servant who has purchased this mysterious volume must cling to the name of Maria Martin amid that sea of words! Even a student of metaphysics accustomed to track Suggestion to her inmost cell, might be glad of that resting-place, and hail the Red Barn as a grateful halting-place for refreshing his intellectual energies. But at this point the Preface-writer staggers on before a gale of virtuous indignation, and under a press of depreciatory adjectives against the spirit-rappers, and can be pursued no further even by the most attentive. The compositors, too, as if bitten by the like fanaticism, coin strange expressions of rebuke, and maliguantly turn rappist mediums into rappist medimus.

Four-fifths of the contents of the volume are occupied by the interpretation of dreams, arranged alphabetically, and expressed in doggrel rhyme. Thus, under A, we have:

> "Alliances with people denotes quarrelling, quite;
> To learn the Alphabet lucky—not if you write;
> But to print it will bring you in business, success;
> Alms to the poor gives joy; to the rich, distress."

Again:

> "Arms denote losses; armor security forebodes;
> Arrows shew bad-luck, that you'll die poor on the roads."

Lady Blessington did not write excellent verse, but she never wrote this sort of thing:

> "Bacon if you dream of, no good luck you will get;
> To catch a badger, you'll prosperity see yet."

But who makes it a practice to dream of catching a badger? Surely even "billious and phlegmatic persons" are not harrassed with such very remarkable visions as these?

> "To dream of a bearded woman signifies death,
> Or that you are beaten, some accident, and bad health."

A couplet which would scarcely satisfy the shade of Mr. Alexander Pope, as to grammar, metre, or rhyme.

> "Dreaming of a bookbinder foretells prosperous times."

But who ever dreams of abstract bookbinders? On the other hand, the next omen of personal reverence and high social position is likely enough to occur to any one:

> "Dreaming of sitting on a chair denotes great respect."

Among other remarkable pickings from this Book of Fate, we have the following:

> "To dream of a corpse is a fortune to you quite:
> Conversing with a count, humiliation downright;"

which, as counts go, is rather a sagacious deduction.

> "To see dragons is scorn and ruin to your best scheme," though, fortunately, one does not often see dragons.

> "Dirt shews good times, and that plenty on you shall fall;"

but there is painful uncertainty about this sybilline statement as to the benefit to be expected. Plenty of what?

"Foals, flowers, or flying in the air are good signs;" but "dreaming of catching fleas denotes much trouble." This is almost enough of the Interpreter, although it is the only portion of this delightful work which is not absolutely senseless and inconsequent. It is, without doubt, the part which has the greatest attraction for purchasers, since all of us can dream; whereas the remainder of the volume, devoted to The Wonderful Art of Shewing Visions in the Crystal, only concerns that minority of the human race who happen to possess a crystal. Even if you have this advantage, it is of no use to you, unless you chance to have been born at the midnight hour. In that fortunate case, however, you will indeed be 'a seer of visions,' and be able to communicate with all departed spirits. "Of course, this faculty is reasonably disputed by all who do not possess it; notwithstanding, there are thousands of persons of both sexes, now living, in different families, in various parts of the united kingdoms (to say nothing of the rest of the world,) who are ready to come forward to asseverate on their solemn oaths the startling fact, that they have received warnings from divers people at the moment [sic] of dying."

Than this, one might imagine that the weakness of verbiage could no further go; but this is not the case, as the following proves. "Indeed, this broad metaphysical fact may be asserted (without being justly declared superstitions,) that most persons, when near their end, possess then the superhuman spiritual foreknowledge of the day or night of their departure from this world. Let this striking proof of immortal discernment—a something unseen within every human being above mere mortality, sink deep into the minds of atheists."

The ingenuity with which this writer procrastinates with his subject—the Crystal—is truly admirable; however, we get it at last. "Those who are Seers should get made, from a large piece of the same kind of transparent mineral that crystal spectacle lenses are made of, a solid clear globe (about the diameter of an ordinary dinner-plate,) of an egg-form at the ends. Thus prepared, let them get any other intelligent morally-disposed person [sic]—no matter if not a Seer—to charge the crystal, while they look close into it, with a vision of some absent person, after the manner of the Countess of Blessington, as related in her works." Now, this is too bad. Is the maid servant who purchases this interesting volume not only to be put to the considerable expense of procuring a magic crystal of the diameter of a dinner-plate, but also of buying the whole of the works of the late Countess of Blessington? Otherwise, how is she to know how to charge the Crystal?" At public dinners, I have heard the toast-master exclaim: "Gentlemen, charge your glasses," in a tone sufficiently striking for an incantation; but what charging meant, beyond filling them, I have never had a notion. There is not the slightest information here vouchsafed upon this most important point. We only learn of a certain Mr. Baker—"not a Seer himself, but a worker of the supernatural power of spirits"—that his method of charging the crystal was the following, which certainly seems simple enough: "He shut his eyes, placed the ends of the fingers of his right hand on the top of the crystal, and in a loud and solemn tone, commanded the wished-for person to appear, after uttering this simple incantation," which reminds one of Mr. Southey's poem upon the "Falls of Lodore:"

> "Ye spirits at rest, ye spirits now blest,
> Ye spirits walking, ye spirits talking,
> Ye spirits sleeping, ye spirits weeping,
> Ye spirits working, ye spirits quaking,
> From the east, west, south, and north,
> I command thee, John Jones, to come forth."

For many minutes, little seems to come of this, except that the Seer "appeared like a person mesmerized, red in the face, and his eyes ran copiously with tears;" but at last John Jones is recognized in the Crystal; and well worth all the trouble must the sight have been, for by our author's account, there is not such another victim to the miscarriage of British justice to be found on the earth's surface. Mr. John Jones is perceived as a convict at Botany Bay, to which unfortunate position he was brought by the following circumstances: "He had been innocently transported for seven years, from St. Albans his native town, for taking, in fun, a packet of cards out of a man's pocket, to play a second time with others in the room; and which term was increased by an additional three years, because he had given a false name to conceal the disgrace from his family."

There is some stupid Information for Mothers on the powers of the Ruling Planets over the fate of their Offspring; and then we have come to the end of our sixpenny-worth! Sixpence, for which we can get three plays of William Shakspeare, or the noble Goldsmith's poems (not to mention an entire monthly part of Chambers's Journal!) has been spent, and is being spent, by tens of thousands, upon this senseless rubbish!

But even the popularity of The Countess of Blessington's True Interpreter pales, we are informed, before that of Madame de Stael's Manual of Necromancy, "by which she foretold the Destiny of People of all Classes in the Temple of Fate attached to the mysterious abode she resided in at Paris, during the reign of King Louis XVI. and the Emperor Napoleon the First." Madame de Stael, it seems, was not only a philosopher, but "a deep-thinking and far-seeing necromancer," about whose magic powers "rumor agitated the public mind," even before "the improving hand of Time had removed her mysterious antiquated domicile to make way for extensive alterations in the neighborhood. Then the great secret was discovered, and after a minute search among a mass of documents concealed in a cabinet, her great book of Divination and Necromancy came to light." The editor of this wonderful sixpenny-worth has been so good as to translate into modern English, "as well as the idiom of the old French style of writing would permit," the account of her singular proceedings over the Black Fountain, shining like crystal, yet as dark as midnight, that stood in the centre of a lofty apartment having a dome in the ceiling, divided into twelve allegorical compartments which she called her Temple of Fate. Also, says he, "from an engraved copy and specification of an oil painting that was found hanging in her private closet, we are enabled to give a very accurate representation of Madame de Stael's figure and style of costume." The illustration appended is indeed a very striking one, no color less remarkable than green and yellow being employed. Madame de Stael in a red dressing gown fringed with gold is threatening with a long stick an unfortunate nobleman, already suffering, (to judge from the large basin over which he leans,) from what the "old French" language must have called mal de mer; a lady of rank lies prostrate upon the floor, overcome by the same indisposition; while a black page-boy (in buttons) projects his eyes and lips in undisguised horror at the double catastrophe.

For the benefit of female readers, there is a long "specification" of Madame de Stael's apparel as a sorceress, as also of that of her visitors, comprising a second nobleman and a second lady of rank in addition to the two distingnished sufferers. The ladies are "two German persons of title, whose names, given in confidence, we shall only distinguish by their initials as Lady M. and Countess L.;" the noblemen are no less individuals than the Right Honorable George Canning and Mr. Huskisson, who, under assumed names, it seems, came to have the future predicted. "O fu.ile infatuation," thought Madame de Stael, eyeing them with her most searching looks, until they "felt creeping over them an indefinable sensation of trepidation," and touching them with the thin end of her long wand until it "had the effect of almost paralyzing them."

"Presumptious [sic] men, I know ye!" cried she in a commanding tone.

> But if with Destiny you still would soar,
> Here take one look, and you'll look no more.

Accordingly, "that highly-gifted, talented star of the British senate," Mr. Canning, applies himself to the Black Fountain, and is by no means gratified by the result. Mortals Know thy Fate (for Magic has no syntax) is inscribed over that fatal basin, and Mr. C. perceives himself "upon his death-bed, deserted by his boon-companions—which melancholy fate, alas! was too soon realized." As for poor Mr. Huskisson, the vision he beheld "revealed to him the dreadful fate of being crushed to death by a steam-engine and carriages attached."

The two ladies were equally unfortunate. "It was enough! With loud shrieks they fell senseless to the ground, one over the other, where, pale and lifeless like corpses, they lay for three hours, before the Priestess of the awful Temple of Fate could revive them to consciousness by the administration of elixirs brought from her secret Arcaneum of Chemistry." This does not present an encouraging example of the consultation of oracles; and, as if conscious of that circumstance, the editor abruptly takes leave of Madame de Stael, of whom nothing is heard further, and betakes himself to "Fortune-telling by means of cards, dice, and dominoes." After this—which is rather a bathos after the "Temple of Fate"—we are introduced to the Calendar of Futurity, or the Influence of Saints' Days upon Human Affairs. This power, perhaps in consequence of England being a Protestant country, does not seem to be very great. St. Matthias' day, for instance, is declared to be "Not fortunate for speculators, but good to begin a steady trade upon," which surely may be said of most days. Moreover, "it is not favorable to make requests on, especially to endeavor to borrow money"—which we can very easily believe.

Then we have "Experiments on Destiny," once more with cards, which are infallible, "if a servant wishes to know about a situation to which she may be going"—a recipe which makes apparent what class of person most affects Dreamers' Guides. "If three tens come together, you will marry well; but if the ten of spades is next to the seven of diamonds, beware of temptation and seduction."

Finally, we have "Charms" in great variety. How to make a man love you, whether he is previously inclined to do so or not! How to tell whether you will have a family! How to inform yourself (by a combination of peas, beans, and oats) "whether your future husband is a drunkard, or in the habit of stopping out late at night!" How to make a dying relative think of you in his will! How to dream of your lover; and how "to make his nose itch until he has had an interview with you, and forgiven any fault that has offended him!" The means adopted to insure these great results are simple enough in themselves (so as to be within the reach of the maid-servant part of the community,) though extremely complicated in their application. They are also so similar in character that one example may well serve for all.

THE MYSTIC SPELL.

For testing whether a supposed friend is a real one or not, or whether your lover is true or false.—Get three, five, seven, nine, eleven, or thirteen leaden bullets; they must be new, and all of different sizes, and must not have been made by yourself. If you are a male, you must choose even numbers; if a female, odd: we will say, for comparison [sic,] that you are a female; well, you get seven bullets, according to the above directions: as the clock strikes ten, you must bury them in the ground, seven inches deep, that is, one inch for every bullet you use; this you must do six consecutive nights, taking them up each day as the clock strikes the same hour; and on the sixth day you must sprinkle them with rose-water or lavender-water (either will do, and any time of the day will do for this.) and tie them in your left sock or stocking, on going to bed, placing them under your pillow: and if the person you are testing is true, he will appear to you in a vision in the course of the night; if, on the other hand, he is playing you false, you will see nothing. You must not try this charm or mystic spell with less than three, or more than thirteen bullets; if you do, it will destroy the spell, and you might as well let it alone.

☞ With this last remark we cordially agree: "You might just as well let it alone."

Anything more futile, wordy, and nonsensical than these two sixpenny-worths of foreknowledge it is impossible to imagine; but it is really a serious matter that this rubbish finds such universal acceptance among the class to whom it is addressed. How scant must be the education of our parochial school since it permits such gross credulity in its pupils! There is no back-street in London without at least one shop in which such publications as these are flaunting in the windows; and, indeed, their circulation is reckoned by the hundred thousand. There are numbers of works similar to these we have noticed above; but the peculiarity of these two (which we understand to be the most popular of all) is that "Suobbism" has been called in to the aid of Superstition. Even the maid servants bow down, it seems, before the fetich of social position, and prefer, to ordinary dream-books, works which are dignified by the imposing names of Madame de Stael and the Countess of Blessington.—Chambers's Journal.

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH SCENERY.—To the traveller, who gazes upon the feudal castles, parks, and far-famed battle-fields of England, emotions, at once tender and sublime, must arise. He beholds not only natural beauty, but a map of history, such as perhaps no other spot can rival. A world of thronging images must crowd on his mind, and from the present scene, which often disappoints, he is wiled away into the remote past, while the line of Britain's kings passes before, and on the grass-grown site of battle or tournament he seems to hear the clang of the mailers' charge, or to behold the bright glances of Yeosond or Philippe. Often the neat cottage of the farmer is actually before him; but the field where a monarch did battle for his kingdom is around, and while nature is often stinted and limited in her gifts, a living world of romance and moral beauty is before him, which peoples every nook with thronging heroes. The scenery of England, rather tame than grand, would awaken sentiments of domestic peace alone, were it not for the moral grandeur which hovers around her horizon, and to which the peasant's child is not wholly a stranger. That the scenery of a land has much to do in forming the characters of its inhabitants, is a truth almost self-evident. Hence the bold daring of the Swiss mountaineers, and the lofty independence of the Scottish Highlander. The scenes to which our minds are accustomed in early youth have ever a mighty hold on the heart, and those scenes, whether peacefully beautiful or terribly sublime, must have a moulding influence upon our lives.

The scenery of our own fair land, although not without its romance of history, is yet, in itself, so majestic, so magnificently beautiful, that it is no wonder that its school alone developed the lofty stoicism of the American Indian. Rocks, whose abrupt precipices form the grand walls of a majestic arena; waterfalls, whose leap is hundreds of feet; mountains, whose tops are crowned with an eternal diadem of clouds: rivers, whose silvery windings circle gem like islands in their sweep—all combine to render American scenery intrinsically and eternally grand. From the far West, lost in its maze of endless prairie, to the cultivated East, with its wealth of cities and hamlets, each nestled among its own peculiar beauties—our land stands distinguished as the garden of the world. The painter may rove amid its vast solitude, and his pencil will but portray shadows of the beauty he everywhere beholds, and the poet may catch inspiration from the dash of its roaring cataracts, or from the music of its southern groves. Blessed with unbounded facilities, it is no wonder that America is hailed as the home of the world, reaching with her arms of beauty and bounty the remotest corner of earth. From the contemplation of such grandeur, the mighty spirits of the Revolution no longer surprise us; they were but the spontaneous growth of such a land; and that their children inherit their dispositions, the obstinacy and bravery displayed in the present contest leave little doubt.—American Miscellany.

PERHAPS SO.—Counselor R——, who was afterward appointed to the bench of the Supreme Court in the —— State, is a lawyer of extensive legal attainments, and in accepting the ermine forsook a very large and lucrative practice. He has, however, the reputation of being the longest-winded counsel and most prosy advocate that ever tried a case in these parts. His jury arguments rarely fell short of seven hours in length, and his examinations of witnesses were tedious beyond conception. The following "veritable fact" is told of him as illustrating his style in this behalf:

At court, not long since, Mr. R—— was engaged in the trial of a cause where the opposite side had attempted to prove the alleged signature of Ebenezer Carleton a forgery. An expert had sworn that in his opinion it was not the handwriting of Ebenezer Carleton, and was turned over to Counselor R——, who cross-examined him in this wise:

"Mr. Witness, look at this signature again; look particularly at the letter E. Now tell the Court and jury what you see in the first hair-line of this letter that makes you think it is not a genuine signature."

The question having been answered as well as it could be, Mr. R—— continued:

"Now look at the turn at the top of the E, and tell us how that differs from the turn of an E in the genuine signature."

And so he went on, examining the witness as to the up-strokes, the down-strokes, the loop, and the turns of this letter E, for nearly an hour, till the patience of the Court was pretty well exhausted.

"Mr. R——," said the Judge, "are you not making this examination rather tedious?"

"Perhaps so. May it please your Honor, the witness may now pass on to the letter b."

A DISCOMFITED DODGER.

THERE is Peter Loafer, a shoemaker in an Essex village, who hates work and loves beer, and is always endeavoring to obtain the latter without enduring the former, by the exercise of his ingenuity. He had a dodge for using pasteboard instead of leather in the repair of boots, to the great saving of trouble and expense to himself, but somehow the articles thus mended were not as waterproof as the owners considered desirable; so the cobbler of a neighboring village, who stuck to the adage, "There's nothing like leather," carried off a great deal of Peter's custom. Then he manufactured most artistic snares, which the hares, momentarily captured, dishonestly carried away with them; he trained a lurcher to catch him game, and the undiscerning animal deposited a fine rabbit at his master's feet while he was engaged in establishing his innocence to the squire, who, meeting him in the fields, had taxed him with his rumored proclivities for poaching. But poor Peter's last dodge was as cunning as it was dishonest, which is saying a great deal for its ingenuity. A new branch of a railway was opened in his immediate neighborhood last summer, and Peter, ever glad of unsticking himself from his last, took a holiday on the occasion, and spent the day in sitting on a gate by the side of the line, watching the trains run past, and dreamily speculating, after the manner of Dodgers, honest or dishonest, on a dozen different matters connected with the subject which attracted his attention. Amongst others, he thought upon the immense weight of the engine and subsequent carriages which slipped along so easily; what effect they would have upon a man's toe if they ran over it, upon his leg, upon his body; upon a thin piece of metal. He had a fourpenny-bit in his pocket, and could solve this last problem at once. The coin was placed on the nearest rail, and shortly afterwards another train came sweeping past. Peter jumped off his gate; there was the fourpenny-bit on the same spot, but defaced and flattened out to the size of a sixpence. An idea immediately struck Peter; he went straight to the public-house, called for a pot of fourpenny ale, and tendered the battered piece in payment; the landlady gave him twopence change, taking the coin for an old sixpence.

The heart of this Dishonest Dodger bounded in his breast; he thought that he had found a safe way of increasing all his earnings by one-third; and as he lay awake in bed that night, he debated with himself whether he should in future take one pot in three more beer, or one hour in three less work. This he finally left an open question, to be decided according to the fancy of the moment; but one thing he was determined upon, and that was to pass his capital through the railway mint at once. The capital of an idle, tippling cobbler! Well, yes, Peter was shrewd enough to put a certain proportion of what he was paid for every job into a wooden money-box, which he had once obtained at the knock-'em-downs of a fair; this was his leather money, and however thirsty he might be, he never even felt a temptation to infringe upon it, so thoroughly was he pursuaded of the fact, that, if he did not keep this little sum sacred to the purpose of replenishing his stock of leather, he was a lost shoe-mender.

But between spending his capital and investing it in a speculation where the profits promised to be so large and the returns so quick, there was all the difference imaginable. So, on the following morning he opened his money-box, which he found to contain some two pounds, shut up his stall, and walking off to the neighboring town, managed, by telling one plausible story at the bank, another at an inn, and a third at the toll-bar, to change nearly the whole of his coin into fourpenny bits.

"Did you ever?" inquired Mrs. Jones, as he walked through the village that evening.

"What?" screamed Mrs. Adams, from a neighboring wash tub.

"Here's Peter Loafer been to Gorham, and come back sober!"

"No!" cried Mrs. Adams, running out all suddy. "Well, I never!"

They knew not how absorbing is the prosecution of a new scheme, whether for good or evil, to the Dodger mind.

That night Peter, like one intent upon self immolation before the Juggernaut of civilization, sought out a solitary part of the line, and carefully arranged some hundred fourpenny-bits on the nearest rail. Then retiring, he anxiously awaited the train. A distant rumble, a roar, an earthquake, two bright eyes and a fiery beard, a resistless rush—it has passed. Peter ran forward to secure his instantaneously minted sixpences; but where were they? Knocked on one side, perhaps, or carried on a few yards. He had brought his poacher's dark-lantern with him, and spent the whole night in a fruitless search. The too ingenious Peter had expended his little all upon plating the wheel of a railway engine.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1865.

THE PIONEERS.

THE Oration and Poem delivered before the Pioneers at the celebration on the 9th inst., possessed in common one notable feature. Neither, as far as we observe, contained any allusion to the fall of '49 or spring of '50. This grave omission might seem to justify the rule laid down by a cotemporary, that none but Pioneers should speak for Pioneers, but as it might be consequently urged that none but Mechanics should address the Mechanics' Institute, and none but Orphans the Orphan Asylum, we fear that in the abstract it must be abandoned.

In truth, the usual vein of pioneer eulogium has been slightly overworked, and the most sensible pioneers are beginning to feel it. Thoughtfully considered, there is little, if any, romance or poetical association connected with the American occupation of California; the chronicle of hardship and adventure, though often sensational and terrible, is not of a quality that could be elegantly spread upon the records of the State, or dwelt upon with pride by the descendants of pioneers. Duelling, Murder, Vigilance Committees, Fires, and Inundations, are not interesting to look back upon, except as the elemental chaos from which society was eventually formed. No wave of religious enthusiasm, like that which precipitated the original settlers upon the rocky slums of New England, or carried the arms of Spanish conquest over the plains of Mexico, brought the Pioneers to this shores; no industrial energy, like that of the sturdy back woodsman in the Far West, ever opened a way to our solitudes. If the truth must be told, the character of our founders bore some resemblance to that which Northern men have been fond of satirically imputing to the first families of Virginia and Maryland—a character in which adventure and recklessness partook of a larger share than moral strength and refinement. It is not to be, therefore, wondered that the versatile poet of the late celebration went back to Columbus for a hero, or that the eloquent orator contented himself with such abstract propositions of "unity of races," and speculations for the future.

The key-note of all that is pleasant and profitable in pioneer history was struck by the late Edward Randolph in his memorable address before this society some years ago. Orations as eloquent and learned have been since delivered, but we doubt if there have been any as peculiarly fit and appropriate, and bearing directly upon what we conceive to be the real purpose and object of the Pioneer Society. In his discourse, which was an outline history of California, he spoke chiefly of the earlier records of Missions and pious padres, which contains all of romantic and legendary interest which the story of California possesses. The lesson taught by Mr. Randolph, that there were earlier pioneers than those before him—that the record of that half civilization which flourished on this coast before the usurpation of the Americans, contained as many points of historic interest as the crude organizations of enlightened races; that among that class dismissed from recognition under the title of "Greasers," were such men as Junipero Serra and the many missionaries, whose labors form the early records of sacrifice and self-devotion—was not without effect. The reception of these truths, and the opportunities for research and interesting discussion which they offered, have kept the Society of Pioneers from sharing the fate of similar institutions, and of becoming merely a club devoted to mutual admiration and self-perpetuation, whose duties began and ended with the enrollment of new members, and the payment of the last tribute of respect to the memory of the old.

The present association of Pioneers offers a nucleus, around which a California Historical Society might be fairly gathered. Its members comprise many men who have achieved other eminence than that which simply devolves upon them from the mere accident of their early arrival in the State. While it would be well to preserve those records which still live in the memory of the present population, for the future historian, it would be as properly in the line of their duty, and much more interesting to our people, to collect and obtain through research and care some chronicle of those earlier periods, of which so little is generally known. A volume of this character, published under their authority and sanction, would entitle them to a consideration, both here and abroad, which they have not yet attained. In the course of time, posterity will be able to make a fair and impartial use of the records of '49 and '50, assigning to those pioneers who have really "done the State some service" their proper place in history, and quietly shelving those whose importance is claimed only by priority of residence. We are yet too near many of these events, interwoven with the history of our young civilization, to get the clear comprehensive view of the historian. It takes fifty years to settle the reputation of most great men—a hundred to adjust the relations of any event. In fifteen years, we have already changed many of our opinions in regard to contemporaneous men and incidents. It is quite evident, then, that any contemporaneous history of our time would be biassed by the unconscious influence and presence of individuals immediately connected therewith, and it is to this influence that the present system of pioneer chronicle is open.

But, inasmuch as they have shown a proper appreciation of these difficulties, which beset their organization, and have exhibited a disposition of late years to make their society a medium for the collection of interesting and valuable material connected with the early history of Alta California; that many rare works, antiquities and curiosities from the old Missions have already been added to their museum and library; that they have endeavored to reproduce, by characteristic relics and through photographs and paintings, the Spanish antiquities and building on this coast, and that greater improvement and more diligent research is projected for the future, when the state of their treasury shall justify a larger outlay, they deserve the best wishes and co-operations of all Californians who desire the welfare of their adopted State, whether they came before or after the Fall of '49 or Spring of '50.

Revival in the Eastern Literary Press.—The return to peaceful avocations of our Eastern brethren, and the cessation of martial excitements and war telegrams, seems to have brought about that revival in periodical literature which the sanguine so confidently predicted. Some old literary journals are resurrected, and a few later and fresher enterprises are born to apparently promising prospects. The latest mail brings new faces to our exchange table. The smart Saturday Press, whilom a "brief abstract and chronicle of "Pfaffs," snappy with absinthian wit, and dying of its own Bohemian excesses and dissipations, has been revived under apparently more moral auspices, and in respectable quarto form. Let us hope that this corruption has put on incorruption. Artemus Ward is a contributor to its first number in a not over-bright theatrical criticism. The Citizen, if we may judge from its specimen number, bids fair to be a powerful and earnest journal—at present a little too voluble on the subject of its clever editor, Col. Halpin (Miles O'Reilly,) and intimating a little too plainly that it has sprung from the popularity of a single individual. The Round Table, in its specimen sheet, has spoken of its own merits with such ingenuous frankness and confidence as to leave no available complimentary epithet in the vocabulary of its cotemporaries. During its previous brief career, it exhibited many excellent qualities; yet, as it was not entirely successful in its attempts to prove Mr. Longfellow to be no poet, and Howadj Curtis no writer, it may be fair to presume that its vague threats, now intimated of the prospective demolition of Irving and Prescott, will prove harmless. Its critical successes are chiefly confined to a raid upon theatrical critics and Bohemians, which gave it a certain local prestige. As there is still an opportunity for it to be all that it aspires to be, we reserve further criticism, and heartily wish it success. Mrs. Grundy improves, and though not yet quite up to the measure of its resources and metropoliton position, bids fair to reach it. From The Weekly Review, with its clever McArone, its common-sensible editorials, and able staff of contributors; The Leader, with its strong metropolitan flavor, its versatile Ada Clare—whose capital book reviews are most feminine in their vivacity and charming style, and most unfeminine in their logical good sense and judgment—its readable selections, its dramatic critics, its somewhat ancient politics, down to such familiar faces as the Atlas, Times, and Mercury, the Boston and Philadelphia literary weeklies, all seem to shine with renewed lustre as they emerge from the turmoil and material conflict of the past few years.

More Sailing Matches.—The schooners Sarah, Louise, and Ellen, are matched to-morrow to sail for five hundred dollars, over the usual track. The Caroline Mills and Pride of the West have been also allowed to enter for the championship of the race. These are all good-sized Bay schooners, and the contest will be a spirited one.

Fishing Extraordinary.—At Vallejo-street wharf on Wednesday last six six sharks were caught with shark-hooks; two of them were five feet long. One mammoth fellow, about fifteen feet long, was fastened to, but wrenched off the chain, carrying away the hook as a trophy.

For Sale—A good route on the Californian.

[For the Californian.]

FROM A BALCONY.

THE little stone balcony, which, by a popular fallacy, is supposed to be a necessary appurtenance of my window, has long been to me a source of curious interest. The fact that the asperities of our summer weather will not permit me to use it but once or twice in six months, does not alter my concern for this incongruous ornament. It affects me as I suppose the conscious possession of a linen coat or nankeen trousers might affect a sojourner here who has not entirely outgrown his memory of Eastern summer heat and its glorious compensations—a luxurious providence against a possible but by no means probable contingency. I do no longer wonder at the persistency with which San Franciscans adhere to this architectural superfluity in the face of climatical impossibilities. The balconies in which no one sits, the piazzas on which no one lounges, are timid advances made to a climate whose churlishness we are trying to temper by an ostentation of confidence. Ridiculous as this spectacle is at all seasons, it is never more so than in that bleak interval between sunset and dark, when the shrill scream of the factory whistle seems to have concentrated all the hard unsympathetic quality of the climate into one vocal expression. Add to this the appearance of one or two pedestrians, manifestly too late for their dinners, and tasting in the shrewish air a bitter premonition of the welcome that awaits them at home, and you have one of those ordinary views from my balcony, which makes the balcony itself ridiculous.

But as I lean over its balustrade to-night—a night rare in its kindliness and beauty—and watch the fiery ashes of my cigar drop into the abysmal darkness below, I am inclined to take back the whole of that preceding paragraph, although it cost me some labor to elaborate its polite malevolence. I can even recognize some melody in the music which comes irregularly and fitfully from the balcony of the Museum on Market street, although it may be broadly stated that, as a general thing, the music of all museums, menageries, and circuses becomes greatly demoralized—possibly through association with the beasts. So soft and courteous is this atmosphere that I have detected the flutter of one or two light dresses on the adjacent balconies and piazzas, and the front parlor windows of a certain aristocratic mansion in the vicinity which have always maintained a studious reserve in regard to the interior, to-night are suddenly thrown into the attitude of familiar disclosure. A few young people are strolling up the street with a lounging step which is quite a relief to that usual brisk, business-like pace which the chilly nights impose upon even the most sentimental lovers. The genial influences of the air are not restricted to the opening of shutters and front doors—other and more gentle disclosures are made, no doubt, beneath this moonlight. The bonnet and hat which passed beneath my balcony a few moments ago, were suspiciously close together. I argue from this that my friend the editor will probably receive any quantity of verses for his next issue, containing allusions to "Luna," in which the original epithet of "silver" will be applied to this planet, and that a "boon" will be asked for the evident purpose of rhyming with "moon," and for no other. Should neither of the parties be equal to this expression, the pent up feelings of the heart will probably find vent later in the evening over the piano, in "I wandered by the brookside," or "When the moon on the lake is beaming." But it has been permitted me to hear the fulfilment of my prophecy even as it is uttered. From the window of number Twelve hundred and Seven, gushes upon the slumbrous misty air, the maddening ballad "Ever of Thee," while at Twelve hundred and Eleven, the "Star of the Evening" rises with a chorus. I am inclined to think that there is something in the utter vacuity of the refrain in this song, which especially commends itself to the young. The simple statement, "Star of the Evening," is again and again repeated with an imbecile relish; while the adjective "beautiful" recurs with a steady persistency, too exasperating to dwell upon here. At occasional intervals, a bass voice enunciates "Star-r! Star-r!" as a solitary and independent effort. Sitting here in my balcony, I picture the possessor of that voice as a small, stout young man, standing a little apart from the other singers, with his hands behind him, under his coat tail, and a severe expression of countenance. He sometimes leans forward, with a futile attempt to read the music over somebody else's shoulder, but always resumes his old severity of attitude before singing his part. Meanwhile, the celestial subjects of this choral adoration look down upon the scene with a tranquility and patience which can only result from the security with which their immeasurable remoteness invests them. I would remark that the stars are not the only topics subject to this "damnable iteration." A certain popular song, which contains the statement, "I will not forget you, mother," apparently reposes all its popularity on the constant and dreary repetition of this unimportant information, which at least produces the desired result among the audience. If the best operatic choruses are not above this weakness, the unfamiliar language in which they are sung offer less violation to common sense.

—[It may be parenthetically stated here that the songs alluded to above may be found in sheet music on the top of the piano of any young lady who has just come from boarding-school. "The Old Arm Chair," or "Woodman, Spare that Tree," will be also found in easy juxtaposition. The latter songs are usually brought into service at the instance of an uncle or bachelor brother, whose request is generally prefaced by a remark deprecatory of the opera, and the gratuitous observation that "we are retrograding, sir—retrograding;" and that "there is no music like the old songs." He sometimes condescends to accompany "Maria" in a tremulous baritone, and is particularly forcible in those passages where the word "repeat" is written, for reasons stated above. When the song is over, to the success of which he feels he has materially contributed, he will inform you that you may talk of your "arias," and your "romanzas," "but for music, sir—music—" at which point he becomes incoherent and unintelligible. It is this gentleman who suggests "China," or "Brattle Street," as a suitable and cheerful exercise for the social circle. There are certain amatory songs, of an arch and coquettish character, familiar to these localities, which the young lady being called upon to sing, declines with a bashful and tantalizing hesitation. Prominent among these may be mentioned an erotic effusion entitled, "I'm Talking in My Sleep," which, when sung by a young person vivaciously and with appropriate glances, can be made to drive languishing swains to the verge of madness. Ballads of this quality afford splendid opportunities for bold young men, who, by ejaculating "Oh" and "Ah" at the affecting passages, frequently gain a fascinating reputation for wildness and skepticism.]—

But the music which called up these parenthetical reflections has died away, and with it the slight animosities it inspired. The last song has been sung, the piano closed, the lights are withdrawn from the windows, and the white skirts flutter away from stoops and balconies. The silence is broken only by the rattle and rumble of carriages coming from theatre and opera. I fancy that this sound—which, seeming to be more distinct at this hour than at any other time, might be called one of the civic voices of the night—has certain urbane suggestions, not unpleasant to those born and bred in large cities. The moon, round and full, gradually usurps the twinkling lights of the city, that one by one seem to fade away and be absorbed in her superior lustre. The distant Mission hills are outlined against the sky, but through one gap the outlying fog which has stealthily invested us, seems to have effected a breach, and only waits the co-operation of the laggard sea breezes to sweep down and take the beleaguered city by assault. An ineffable calm sinks over the landscape. In the magical moonlight the shot-tower loses its angular outline and practical relations, and becomes a minaret from whose balcony an invisible muezzin calls the Faithful to prayer. "Prayer is better than Sleep." But what is this? a shuffle of feet on the pavement, a low hum of voices, a twang of some diabolical instrument, a preliminary hem and cough. Heavens! it cannot be! Ah, yes—it is—it is—SERENADERS!

Anathema Maranatha! May purgatorial pains seize you, William, Count of Poitou, Girard de Boreuil, Arnaud de Marveil, Bertrand de Born, mischievous progenitors of jongleurs, troubadours, provençals, minnesingers, minstrels and singers of cansos and love chants! Confusion overtake and confound your modern descendants, the "metre ballad mongers," who carry the shamelessness of the middle ages into the nineteenth century, and awake a sleeping neighborhood to the brazen knowledge of their loves and wanton fancies. Destruction and demoralization pursue these pitiable imitators of a barbarous age, when ladies' names and charms were shouted through the land, and modest maiden never lent presence to tilt or tourney without hearing a chronicle of her virtues go round the lists, shouted by wheezy heralds and taken up by blaring swashbucklers. Perdition overpower such ostentatious wooers! Marry! shall I shoot the amorous feline who nightly iterates his love songs on my roof, and yet withhold my trigger finger from yonder pranksome gallant? Go to! There is an orange left of last week's repast. Decay hath overtaken it—it possesseth neither savor nor cleanliness. Ha! cleverly thrown! A hit—a palpable hit! Peradventure, I have still a boot that hath done me service, and, barring a looseness of the heel and ominous yawning at the side, is in good case! Na'theless, 'twill serve. So! so! What! dispersed! Nay, then, I too will retire. BRET.

THE LAW'S VEXATIONS.—Jacob P. Leese, the pioneer, whose father erected the first house in San Francisco, commenced an action of ejectment on the 6th of August, 1858, against W. S. Clarke, of "Clarke's Point" fame, to recover certain premises on the northeast corner of Broadway and Battery streets. After seven years' litigation, the case passing through the Supreme Court, a writ of ejectment was issued against the defendant, and the Sheriff placed in possession; the fact was then developed that W. S. Clarke had no interest in the property, having disposed of it several days prior to the commencement of the suit. The victory obtained through so long and expensive a contest, proves of course a barren one, and a new trial of legal right to the premises becomes necessary.

ANSWER TO "LIBRA."

TO the Editor of THE CALIFORNIAN: The undersigned, who claims to be one of your oldest subscribers, desires to address some remarks to you relative to a series of articles which have appeared in your paper over the signature of "Libra," by the title of "Popular Fallacies." And first, the subscriber will take the liberty to say that, so far as the general tone of your paper is concerned, both as respects the original and the selected articles, he has been well pleased with the taste displayed in providing a family and a fireside journal, pure in sentiment, elegant in style, and replete with entertainment for old and young. But when you admit to your columns articles calculated to sap the foundations of all our established notions and to wipe out the first lessons of our childhood, it is time some of your friends raised a warning voice.

Your contributor has attempted to show—I will not say to prove, for his assertions fall far short of mathematical demonstration or even presumptive evidence—among other things, that a pound of feathers is heavier than a pound of lead, because, forsooth, if weighed under an air pump the lead would kick the beam. Now we can inform "Libra" that it is not customary to weigh lead, or feathers either, in an air pump or under an air pump. We do not mean to be unduly disrespectful, but we question somewhat if "Libra's" brains were put in one scale and an ounce of feathers in another, and the air exhausted from both, that the former would kick the beam!

Again, all the geographies we have ever seen, teach that a child standing on the globe, facing the north and extending his arms, his right hand would point to the east and his left hand to the west. "Libra" says this is not true, and he spins out a long and obscure (unintelligible) paragraph to try and prove it. Perhaps "Libra" is wiser than all the scientific men who have written geographies and all the schoolmasters who have been abroad so long. If so, he should write a new geography and persuade our Board of Education to abolish the old ones.

But these things we might have borne in silence, if the sage "Libra" had not proceeded, in a third article, to gainsay the traditionary faith of our fathers, and to controvert the authority of Job and so many poets, sacred and profane, by undertaking to say that the human body, after death, is not food for worms.

It would be sufficient for us that this doctrine has been received in all ages, and must have been well attested at some time. It is not expected that every one is going to poke his nose into graves or tombs to verify other men's experience.

Some faith is to be attached to human testimony. But we have some direct evidence on this point. A discharged soldier of the Army of the Potomac, who recently died in this city, told the writer of this article that, after the battles of the Wilderness, they had occasion to return over the same ground where they had fought, after an interval of a week or ten days, and where heavy rains had washed away the earth from buried soldiers, and that the diet of worms (not the one that Luther was summoned to) was in active operation then and there. Perhaps, "Libra" can disprove these and similar well authenticated cases!

If, Mr. Editor, this new light in philosophy goes on in this way, insulting common sense by his paradoxes, the next thing we may expect to be told by him will be that two pints do not make a quart, or that one from two leaves three, or some such nonsense. Will you help to disseminate such doctrines among the youth of our land?

We do not know whether this philosopher of yours is male or female. We have spoken of him as male, but a friend informs us that "Libra" is a feminine noun. If his name is "Libra" he must be something between a Virgin and a Scorpion, perhaps possessing the grace and the charms of the one, with the danger and the sting of the other. Or, perhaps by assuming the scales as his emblem, he would arrogate to himself the impartiality of a Justice with the wisdom of a Minerva. But, whatever his gender or pretensions, we advise him or her to let the scales fall from his or her eyes, and then he or she may see more clearly.

We pass by the covert attack on the doctrine of of the final combustion of all things, contained in the remark about the probable immortality of matter. We trust we have said enough to show up the danger and the absurdity of this writer's doctrines.

With you, Mr. Editor, we leave the responsibility of encouraging or condemning such radical and subversive effusions, and we will simply close by recommending "Libra" to turn his attention to something else besides trying to put out the lights which antiquity has set up along our pathway to guide us to truth and happiness. ARRASTRA.

Two new translations of Homer are forthcoming in London: the Iliad, put into English verse in the Spenserian stanza, by Philip Stanhope Worsley, M. A., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and the Odyssey, in blank verse, by the Rev. George M. Musgrave.

"THE DECEITFUL FLORENTINE."

A BALLAD.

THERE was a fine young mariner who sailed upon the sea,
His ship it was a ship of war—a lieutenant was he;
He was a man of gallant mien, and not unknown to fame,
Of high Italian parentage, O'Reilly was his name.

This noble young Italian man made love to Anna Lee,
He said that he did worship her; and she did worship he;
But Anna Lee thought sailor men were said to fickle be,
And she cried: "O, noble Florentine, I ask a pledge of thee!"

Then spoke this noble Florentine: "My love is ever warm;
Take this 'ere button I have cut from off my uniform,
For why, it is the only one our noble President
And merry noble Commodore permits us to present."

With these deceitful words straightway he sailed across the sea,
And stopped awhile at Limerick (a town in Italy;)
And there forgetting of his vows, and of his former flame,
He married an Italian girl, O'Connelly by name.

When Anna Lee received the news, she gave a frightful start,
And said: "You naughty, naughty man, methinks you've broke my heart."
And then she took a pistol up, but for a ball of lead
Down deep into the deadly tube his button rammed instead.

She shot herself; and, maidens all, O listen unto me:
Don't trust too much in Florentines whose name is O'Reilly.
Don't trust to sailors, and if you would save your sinful souls,
Be careful when and how you make such awful button-holes!

NAUTILUS.

LITERARY ITEMS AT HOME AND ABROAD.

IT is rumored that M. Thiers, the historian, who has been for many years making collections for such a work, is writing a History of the Restoration from 1814 to 1830, the first volume of which may be expected early next year.

GUSTAVE DORE, the great and popular artist, is said to be engaged in illustrating Shakspeare for a Paris bookseller, who wants to dispose of a very large edition of the poet, badly translated by M. Letourneur. He is also illustrating the Bible.

MR. JOHN HILL BURTON announces a new History of Scotland, from Agricola's Invasion to the Revolution of 1688. As one of the best Scottish antiquarians, Mr. Burton is well qualified for this self-imposed task.

IN consequence of Florence becoming the capital of the kingdom of Italy, Turin loses that distinction. More than half the Turin newspapers will shift their publication to Florence.

A COLLECTION of letters, addressed to J. J. Rousseau, has been discovered in the town library of Neufchatel, and has been published in Paris.

SIR WILLIAM DENNISON, who has been successively Governor of Van Diemau's Land, New South Wales, and Madras, colonel of engineers, has published a brochure entitled Man not so Old as Supposed.

THERE appears to be a chance that a further portion of H. T. Buckle's History of Civilization, which the author did not live to complete, will soon be published.

A FIFTH edition of Lord Derby's translation of the Iliad of Homer has appeared in London, and has been carefully revised.

AMONG the books lately distributed, by public auction, in London, are those constituting the library of the late Horace Smith, one of the authors of Rejected Adresses, who died in 1849. James Smith, his elder brother and co-author of the above, died in 1839. The books so disposed of were chiefly presentation copies, with autograph inscriptions from the authors.

AT the annual election of members of the Royal Society of London only fifteen were admitted, Alfred Tennyson the poet-laureate, being one. He can now write F. R. S. after his name.

MRS. TRAFFORD is the name of the authoress of City and Suburbs, Too Much Alone, The Moors and the Fens, and George Geith, all of which, but particularly the last, have attained great popularity in England.

MISS MARTINEAU, who seems to have written upon most subjects, from political economy down to farming, is about commencing a new story, to be entitled A Family History, in Once a Week.

THE London Athenæum, of July 15th, contains a notice of Wet Days at Edgewood, much more appreciative than an American author had any reason to expect from that journal.

BISHOP COLENSO has just published a shilling pamphlet on Foreign Missions and Mosaic Traditions.

[The following verses, published in The Californian of May 20th, having been garbled and mispriuted in Eastern journals, are here republished in their origiual form and under their origiual title:]

THE AGED STRANGER.

AN INCIDENT OF THE WAR.

"I WAS with Grant"—the stranger said;
Said the farmer: "Say no more,
But rest thee here at my cottage porch,
For thy feet are weary and sore."

"I was with Grant"—the stranger said;
Said the farmer: "Nay, no more—
I prithee sit at my frugal board,
And eat of my humble store.

"How fares my boy—my soldier boy,
Of the old Ninth Army Corps?—
I warrant he bore him gallantly
In the smoke and the battle's roar!"

"I know him not," said the aged man,
"And, as I remarked before,
I was with Grant"—"Nay, nay, I know,
Said the farmer, "Say no more;

"He fell in battle—I see, alas!
Thou'dst smooth these tidings o'er—
Nay: speak the truth, whatever it be
Though it rend my bosom's core.

"How fell he—with his face to the foe,
Upholding the flag he bore?
O! say not that my boy disgraced
The uniform that he wore!

"I can not tell," said the aged man,
"And should have remarked, before,
That I was with Grant—in Illinois,
Some three years before the war."

Then the farmer spake him never a word,
But beat with his fist full sore
That aged man who had worked for Grant
Some three years before the war!

F. B. Harte.

ARTEMUS WARD ON ARRAH-NA-POGUE.

YOU ask me, sir, to sling sum ink for your paper in regards to the new Irish dramy at Niblo's Gardin. I will do it, sir.

I knew your grandfather well, sir. Sum 16 years ago, while I was amoosin' and instructin' the intellectooal people of Cape Cod with my justly pop'lar Show, I saw your grandfather. He was then between 96 years of age, but his mind was very clear. He told me I looked like George Washiugton. He sed I had a massiv iutellect. Your grandfather was a highly intelligent man, and I made up my mind then that if I could ever help his family in any way I'd do so. Your grandfather gave me sum clams and a Testament. He charged me for the clums, but threw in the Testament. He was a very fine man.

I therefore write for you, which insures yonr respectability at once. It gives you a moral toue at the word go.

I fouud myself the other night at Niblo's Gardin, which is now, by the way, Wheatley's Gardin. (I don't know what's becum of Nib.) I couldn't see not much of a gardin, however, and it struck me if Mr. Wheatley depended on it as regards raisin' things he'd run short of gardin sass. (N. B.—These remarks is yoomerous. The older I gro' the more I want to goak.)

I walked down the ile in my usual dignified stile, politely tellin' the people as I parsed along to keep their seats. "Don't git up for me," I sed. One of the prettiest young men I ever saw in my life showed me into a seat, and I proceeded to while away the spare time by readin' Thompson's Bank Note Reporter and the comic papers.

The ordinance was large.

I tho't, from a cursiry view, that the Finnigan Brotherhood was well represented.

There was no end of bootiful wimin and a heap of good clothes. There was a good deal of hair present that belonged on the heds of peple who didn't cum with it—but this is a ticklish subjeck for me. I larfed at my wife's water-fall, which indoosed that superior woman to take it off and heave it at me rather vilently, and as there was about a half-bushil of it, it knockt me over, and giv me pains in my body which I hain't got over yit.

The orkistry struck up a toon, & I asked the Usher to nudge me when Mr. Pogue cum out on the stage to act.

I wanted to see Pogue, but strange to say, he didn't act durin' the entire eveniu'. I reckin he has left Niblo's, and gone over to Barnum's.

Very industrious people are the actors at Barnum's. They play all day and in the evenin' likewise. I meet 'em every mornin', at 5 o'clock, going to their work with their tin dinner-pails. It's a sublime site. Many of 'em sleep on the premises.

Arrah-na-Pogue was writ by Dion O'Bourcicolt & Edward McHonse. They rit it well. O'Bourcy has rit a cartload of plays himself, the most of which is fust-rate.

I understand there is a large number of O'-gen'lmen of this city who can rite better plays than O'Bourcy does, but somehow they don't seem to do it. When they do, I'll take a Box of them.

As I remarked to the Boy who squirtid pepper sass thro' a tin dinner-horn at my trained Bear, (which it caused that feroshus animal to kick up his legs & howl dismal, which fond mothers tell into swoons and children cride to go home because fearin' the Bear would leave his jungle and tear them from limb to limb,) and then excoosed himself (this Boy did) by sayiu' he had done so while laborin' under a attack of Moral Iusanity—as I sed to that thrifty yooth, "I allus incurridge geenyus, whenever I see it."

It's the same with Dan Bryant. I am informed there are better Irish actors than he is, but somehow I'm allus out of town when they act. & so is other folks, which is what's the matter.

Ack the I. Glendalo by moonlite. Irishmen with clubs. This is in 1798, the year of your birth, Mr. Editor. It appears a patriotic person named McCool has bin raisin a insurrection in the mountaiu districks, and is now goin' to leave the land of his nativity for a tower in Franee. Previsly to doin so he picks the pockit of Mr. Michael Feeny, a gov'ment detectiv', which pleases the gallery very much indeed, and they joyfully remark "hi, hi." He meets also at this time a young woman who luvs him dearer than life, and who is, of course, re'ated to the gov'ment; and jus' as the gov'ment goes agiu him she goes for him. This is nat'ral, but not grateful. She sez, "And can it be so? Ar, tell me it is not so thusly as this thusness wouldst seem!" or words to that effeck. He sez it isn't any other way, and they go off. Irish moosic by the Band. Mr. McCool goes and gives the money to his foster-sister Miss Arrah Meelish, who is goin' to shortly marry Shaun, the Lamp Post. Mac. then alters his mind about goin' over to France, and thinks he'll go up stairs and lie down in the straw. This is in Arrah's cabin. Arrah says its all right, me darlint, och hone, and shure, and other pop'lar Irish remarks, and Mac. goes to his straw.

The weddin' of Shaun and Arrah comes off. Great excitement. Immense demonstration on the part of the peasantry. Barn-door jigs, and rebelyus song by McHouse called "The Drinkin' of the Gin." Ha, what is this? Soldiers cum in. Moosic by the Band. "Arrah," sez the Major, "you have those money. She sez, Oh no, I guess not. He scz, Oh yes, I guess you have. It is my own, sez she, and exhibits it. It is mine, sez Mr. Feeny—and identifies it. Great confusion. Coat is prodoosed from up stairs. Whose coat is this, sez the Major. Is it the coat of a yonng man secreted in this here cabin? Now this is rough on Shaun. His wife accoosed of theft, the circumstances bein very much agin her, and also accoosed of havin a hansum young man hid in her house. But does this bold young Hiberuian forsake her? Not much, he don't. But he takes it all on himself—scz he is the guilty wreteh; and is marcht off to prison.

This is a new idee. It is gin'rally the wife who suffers, in the play, for her husband; but here's a noble young feller who shuts both his eyes to the apparent sinfulness of his new young wife, and takes her right square to his boosom. It was bootiful to me, who love my wife, and believe in her, and would put on my meetin' clothes and go to the gallus for her cheerfully, ruther than believe she was capable of taking any body's money but mine. My married friends, listen to me: If you treat your wives as tho' they were perfeck geutlemen—if you show 'em that you have entire confidence in them, believe 'me, they will be troo to you, most always. I was so pleased with this conduck of Shaun that I hollered out, "Good boy! Come and see me!" "Silence!" sum peple sed. "Put him out!" sed a sweet-scented young man, with all his new clothes on, and in company with a splendid waterfall, "put this old feller out!" "My young friend, I sed, in a loud voice, "whose store do you sell tape in? I might want to buy a yard before I go hum."

Shaun is tried by a Military Commission. Col. O'Grady, altho' a member of the Commission, shows he sympathizes with Shaun, and twits Feeny, the Gov'ment witness, with being a knock kneed thief, &c., &c. Mr. Stanton's grandfather was Scc'y of War in Ireland at that time, so this was entirely proper. Shaun is convicted, and goes to jail. Hears Arrah singin' outside. Wants to see her a good deal. A lucky thought strikes him: he opens the window and gets out. Struggles with ivy and things on the outside of the jail, and finally reaches her just as Mr. Feeny is about to dash a large wooden stone onto his head. He throws Mr. F. into the river. Pardon arrives. Fond embraces. Tears of joy and kisses á la Pogue. Everybody much happy. Curtin falls.

This is a very hasty outiine of a splendid play. Go and see it.

See the beautiful Josie Orton, whose brilliant eyes and sweet winnin' ways made me wish I was Shaun, the lamp-post, myself, even without my parent's consent.

See Mr. Glenny, who is one of the quietest and Irishest of Irishmen—a true artist and a fine singist, if there is one out of the operer.

See Mr. Scallan's powerful and admirable personation of the unpleasant little villain Feeny.

See the genial actor, Mr. Buruett. (O'Grady) whose tavern at Cincinnati I have often stopped at.

See Mr. Norton as the Secretary. He reminds me of Secretary Seward so much that I call him Bill every time I meet him.

See the excellent Mr. Peters, who is so good a cockney servant that we all want to go up on the stage and kick him a little. In short, go and see all of 'em, [if you happeu to be in New York—if not, usk 'em to come and see you, postage paid. You'll never regret the expense.]—New York Literary Post.

How to Write War Lyrics.—In order to be original as well as effective, make the first words of the first liue "Dear Mother," or "Dearest Mother," or "Darling Mother." You must have a Mother of some kind; it is difficult to see how you can do without one. If you refrain from doiug this, at the commeneement, you must commence doing it in the refrain. If you have eoncluded to Come Home to Die (although such a course cannot be unconditionally recommended,) say so at once, and bring it in the chorus. Sometimes call the person yon are addressing "Thee," and sometimes "You;" it looks Singular as well as Plural. Whenever you have occasion to use the word "Memories," be careful to say, "Memories of the Past." This evinces closeness of thought, and is a pleasing distinctiou from the Memories of the Future. Never forget—nor allow any one else to forget—that you might have been "Numbered with the Slaiu." You may make Slain rhyme with Again. In the event of yonr dying, it would be an excellent point to inquire, in general terms, as to the intentions of society at large, with regard to the pecuniary maintenauce of the aged members of your family. For instance, "Who will care for Mother now?" When you have occasion to refer to any of your imaginary companions who are so unfortunate as to be defunct, say "The silent Dead." It removes misapprehension. If, upon mature deliberation, you decide upon dying, request your comrades to observe the various phenomena of your physical condition, such as your perspiring forchead, or, to express it poetically, the "Dampness on yonr Brow." As this idea, however, has now grown rather stale, perhaps it would be better to ask them to look at your Tongue, or to feel your Pulse. If you can contrive to mention that some one is sleeplug beneath the sod, instead of above it, this would be an admirable idea. You cannot be to explicit upon this point, since it saves time in the recovery of the bodies.—Mrs. Grundy.

The Laddies.—In a common-place book we find the following extract from a newspaper, dating about forty years back: John Gordon, who died near Turriff, Bamffshire, some time ago, had attained the remarkable age of 132 years. All the travellers who chanced to call at the neighboring inn of Turriff, were uniformly directed by the landlady, Mrs. Wallace, to the cottage of the patriarch, where they could see, she used to say, the oldest man in Bamffshire, ay, or in the world. Amongst the visitors one day, almost at the close of harvest, was a young Englishmau, who, comiug up to the door of the cottage, accosted a venerable-looking man employed in knitting hose, with, "So, my old friend, you can see to knit at your advanced period of life? One hundred and thirty-two is truly a rare age." "Deil's i the mon! It will be my grandfather ye're seeking. I'm only seventy-two—ye'll find him round the corner of the house." On turning round the corner indicated, the stranger encountered a dilapidated old gentleman, whose whitened locks bore testimony to his having long passed the meridian of life, and whom the stranger at once concluded to be John Gordon himself. "You seem wonderfully fresh, my good sir, for one who has seen so many years; I doubt not but you have experienced many vicissitudes in the course of your very, very long life." "What's yer wull, sir?" inquired the person addressed, whose sense of hearing was somewhat impaired. The observation was repeated in a louder tone. "Oh, ye'll be wantin' my father, I reckon—he's in the yard there." The stranger now entered the garden, when he had at last found the veritable elder busily employed in diggiug potatoes, and humming the balad of the Battle of Harlow. "I have had some difficulty in finding you, friend, as I successively encountered your grandson and son, both of whom I mistook for you; indeed, they seem as old as yourself. Your labor is rather hard for one of your advanced age." "It is," replied John; "but I'm thankfu' that I'm able for't, as the laddies, puir things, are no varra stout the now." The united ages of the worthy trio exceeded three hundred years.

It is a curious fact that, in sacred history, the age, death and burial of only one woman, Sarah, the wife of Abraham, is distinctly noted. Woman's age, ever since, appears not to have been a subject for history or discussion.
